In 1875, had we gone to war over the Virginius affair with Spain, our nation, which calls itself the proudest in the universe, which boasts to-day that to be a citizen under its flag is greater than to have been a Roman citizen in that elder day when to be a Roman was recognized as greater than to be a king—had we gone to war with Spain at that time it was feared and predicted that the proud flag of our country would have been humiliated upon the high seas before a third or fourth class power. Had we gone to war with Italy about the Mafia affair it was recognized by many naval experts, both at home and abroad, that we could not have faced her successfully upon the ocean, and I, for one, Mr. Chairman, am tired of this penny-wise and pound-foolish policy which leaves the greatest, the most populous civilized nation, save Russia, on the face of the earth, the wealthiest, the freest, and the nation which I believe to be the most powerful in the world, bereft of its arms when the occasion arises for the assertion of its rights.

The policy that leaves us in this condition is a humiliating and a shameful one. It is a disgrace to us and most shameful to our national pride, and to the patriotic spirit of our people. It makes all civilization believe that, to save a few dollars in taxes, we are willing to eat all the "leeks" that may be offered us and to accept humble pie from every counter. We must assert ourselves and hold our heads erect.

I think our Republican friends have a proper appreciation of the situation; and though they spent fifteen or twenty years in trying to give us a good Navy and only gave us a bad one, still I think they are honest and patriotic in their desire to do what should be done for the country in this respect. I say to the Democracy, not only to the Democracy of the North but particularly to the Democracy of the South, that it has been the historic policy of the Democratic party to maintain the Navy.

We have under Democratic Administration made it our boast that the Navy was efficient, and that under such Administration, with the hearty concurrence and applause of the whole party, our Navy has been able to compel respect for our flag and to uphold our rights throughout the world. And now, when our party is again in power and when we—especially the men of the South—are called upon to show our patriotism, our devotion to the General Government in which we are participating, it is, above and beyond all, our duty to convince our Northern Democratic brethren and our Northern Republican brethren that so far as they go in patriotism, so far as they move onward in the desire to maintain the honor of the flag, they shall find the men of the South marching side by side with them and doing their full and entire duty to the common country that belongs to us all.

Mr. KILGORE. How large an appropriation will you vote to convince them?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I will vote every dollar that is necessary for the proper defense of our country, if it takes the last cent out of Colonel KILGORE's pocket. [Laughter.]

The South is here, my friends, and, in the language of the late Senator Hill of Georgia, I thank God that she is here to remain—as much a part and parcel of this country as any other part of it. And she has just as much to defend as any other section. Shall she be found wanting in her duty? I do not believe it. She will do as much as any section of the country to defend the nation. She has the same interests, the same feelings, and the same inspirations in the perpetuation and preservation of national honor, credit, and fame.

My friend from the West [Mr. SIMPSON] speaks as if it were a matter of no interest to him if our coasts should be blockaded and our commerce upon the high seas interrupted. Let him stop for a moment to consider the inevitable disaster and woe that would come upon the great West if our harbors at New York, or New Orleans, or Charleston, or Galveston, or Boston, or Baltimore were closed by the hostile demonstrations of foreign ships. What would be the effect upon the exportation of the products of the American farmer from the West and the South?

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not want to be put in a bad light—

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Of course I would not put the gentleman in a bad light.

Mr. SIMPSON. Therefore I wish to state that I did not say what the gentleman has attributed to me. I did not say it was of no interest to me if any of our great ports on the Atlantic seacoast should be blockaded. I said that England and other foreign countries are under bonds to keep the peace with us, because if they should undertake to destroy the property in any of these great cities they would destroy more of their own property than of ours.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. What I have indicated has been the line of argument pursued here—that citizens of the South and the West have no interest in this question, and my friend made one line of his argument from this standpoint—that America owns no ships; that we have no carrying trade ourselves. It is true that we own comparatively few ships; it is true, also, that the great bulk of American commerce with foreign nations is carried on in foreign ships. But none the less does it devolve upon us to protect that commerce, although it happens to be carried in foreign ships. Nine hundred million dollars' worth of American products went across the broad Atlantic to the nations of Europe last year. Whence did those products come? Where were they raised and who would be the sufferers if that commerce were for a month or a year interrupted? Who sell that surplus to the civilized world? The farmers of Kansas (from which State my friend hails) as much as the people from any other section.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman think we should build vessels to protect property under the British flag?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. If it be American property, and if failing to build vessels keeps American property from going abroad of course we should protect that property. I do not care under what flag it sails, it should be protected. My friend would stand in a very poor position before the farmers of Kansas when he goes home if they should find that 500,000 or 5,000,000 bushels of Kansas corn, placed on a British ship to be shipped to Great Britain, could not get out of the port of New York because he had voted for a poor navy insufficient to protect that harbor and drive away the foreign ships that might be preventing that Kansas corn from going out.

Mr. DAVIS. Because we did not build ships to protect the British flag?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I do not care what flag it might be. I want to keep the American ports open; I want to allow you men from the West to send your corn, your wheat, and whatever else you may raise to whatever market you may desire to send it to be sold.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then the gentleman is in favor of free ships?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I have always been in favor of most things being free.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen from the South and West, from whom it is supposed some opposition to this bill may come, are more interested in this matter of strengthening the American Navy than any other class of our population. Almost the entire cotton crop of the South is sold to European nations. The great surplus of the products of the West—their corn, their wheat, their pork, their general agricultural surplus—finds a market in Europe. And it is the duty of the American Congress, if we desire to look after the general welfare, to adopt such a policy, not only that a small nation, not only that a feeble naval power shall not be able to interrupt our commerce, but that we shall be able to maintain a navy strong enough to keep open every American port so that we can seek the markets of the world without vexation, without hindrance, and without interruption from any quarter whatever.

There is woe and misery in Kansas to-day, and the cry of the people has long made itself heard. How much greater would they be, how much more widespread, if in the event of a foreign war the farmers of that State and of the West should find the Atlantic and Pacific ports closed by the superior fleets of the nation with which we were at war, and find the surplus agriculture whose sale in Europe keeps them from the almshouse wasting and decaying in their fields for want of a market because their representatives were too penurious to vote the money necessary to keep the seas clear for the successful shipment of their produce to the place of marketing and sale.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think a battle ship of 10,000 tons displacement is a good ship to protect American commerce on the high seas, or is she not better adapted to coast defense?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. She is good for both purposes. She is a first-class ship to keep your ports open and prevent the blockade of our large cities—

Mr. SIMPSON. Do you not think that the armored cruiser is a more valuable boat as a protection to our commerce?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. No, I do not. I think the heavy battle ship is best for all purposes.

Mr. SIMPSON. You want a swift-moving ship—

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. And I call your attention to another thing. The gentleman from Kansas, in his remarks a few moments ago with reference to the recent naval battles between China and Japan, made some comments which I do not think are warranted by the facts. He stated that the great battle ships have not proved themselves to be effective as against the light-armored, swift cruisers; but, as a matter of fact, the reports show that these Chinese battle ships endured, with but little injury, all of the shot and shell to which they had been subjected from the fire of the Japanese guns and endured with safety every attack on them. They were not injured or destroyed in that way. The naval experts say that if the Chinese ships had been properly handled or handled with the same skill as the Japanese ships in these battles there would have been a very different result. At any rate they withstood every attack made on them.

Mr. LOUD. And is it not also a fact that these ships were built in the seventies?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. And, as my friend from California suggests, they were old ships, built some eighteen or twenty years ago, and even then were not considered to be the best ships of their class.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it not a fact that most of our ships are obsolete or out of date from the time that they are finished?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I will come to that presently.

But further, the two great battle ships of the Chinese destroyed by the Japanese were blown up by torpedoes. Well, the torpedoes would have blown up any other kind of vessels if they came in contact with them.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. They would have blown up "Old Nick," would they not?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. And my friend from South Carolina suggests that they would probably have made short work of "Old Nick" if he had come in contact with them. But my friend from Kansas seems to think that is a reason why we should not build ships of that class, because they are liable to be blown up by torpedoes. And the other gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DAVIS] suggests now that the new ships soon become obsolete or out of date, and that we should not build ships because many of them that we have built have gone out of date. He alleges that as a fatal difficulty in such construction. But, Mr. Chairman, it is an argument that refutes itself. If there are to be changes in the fashions my friend may as well say we should not wear clothes because those we buy to-day may be old-fashioned next year. So long as we build ships equal to the most formidable and the best class built by our rivals we shall do all that is needful for our protection.

Mr. DAVIS. But the gentleman made the point himself that these Chinese ships were old or worn-out ships.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Yes; but I made it from an entirely different standpoint. The gentleman argues against the construction of ships on that ground. I say that these ships were not as good ships as some of more modern build. Shipbuilding has improved somewhat in ten or twenty years. But the world may have in the next ten or twenty years stronger ships, more powerful for battle and grander for defense than any we have to-day. In fact, all things may improve in shipbuilding. This is certainly no argument why we should allow ourselves to be absolutely defenseless in the meantime should such things happen in the distant future. I say it is our duty to be prepared at all times for any emergencies which may arise; and we will certainly be false in our duty to the American people if we leave them defenseless.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Can the Treasury stand the drain right now, though?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I have not any doubt in the world that it can.

What have we to defend? Not only the Western and Southern agricultural products on the seas; we have not only the commerce upon the high seas to protect under the American flag, but the Navy has other duties besides. Here is, for instance, the great city of New York with nearly five thousand millions of property on the seacoast exposed to attack; here is the great city of Boston with another thousand millions of property exposed to attack; here are the cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, Galveston, as well as all of the cities on the Pacific coast, depending for their protection upon the American Navy; and in our present condition if we were to be involved in a foreign war with any of the second-class nations of the world, much less with any of the first-class, we are helpless; we have no Navy to-day that could defend these harbors and ports and prevent these great cities being held up for ransom or plundered by any power which chooses to take advantage of the opportunity.

Mr. SAYERS. In this connection, can anyone tell the number of vessels in the Navy now?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Some five or six battle ships, and a few others.

Mr. SIMPSON. There are four battle ships in all completed, and some not yet completed.

Mr. DAVIS. And they will be out of date before they are done.

Mr. SAYERS. What is the total number?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Forty-nine ships in all.

Mr. SAYERS. Do you not think that with forty-nine ships we could be able to protect ourselves pretty well if these ships were scattered along the coast from New York to Galveston?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. No; I do not. Forty-nine vessels scattered along the American coast between New York and Galveston, as suggested by my friend, reminds me of General Lee's line before Petersburg during the last year of the war, when forty miles of front were defended by 40,000 men, and when General Lee gave that opinion to Mr. Davis and said that in a few days somebody would break through somewhere. That is the present condition of the country with reference to its naval defenses. The line is too long and the fleet would be too much scattered. Breaking through would be a holiday excursion for a hostile fleet.

Mr. SAYERS. What becomes of our fortifications?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Well, they will, to a certain extent, enable us to make some defense. But they are not sufficient. Things have changed and methods also. In old times a wealthy nation could build a great navy in a few months. But this can not be done to-day. New methods of constructions and recent inventions have made the building of a navy the labor of years. We can not now wait until we are attacked and then in a few weeks or months be ready for whatever may happen. All nations are building and equipping their navies long years in advance in the hope that when the crisis shall come they shall not be found wanting or taken unawares. We behold the result of preparation in the war now going on between China and Japan. Japan in peace has prepared for war. She is armed at all points. She has availed herself of the resources of civilization. She wins at all points and we find the weaker power everywhere triumphant. China, with her vast population, her incalculable resources, has made no preparation, and finds herself with her hands tied, her navy driven from the seas, and her whole vast bulk exposed and bleeding at every pore. Shall we, relying upon our native strength and our vast undeveloped capacities, adopt a Chinese policy? Never.

It is historically true that sea power gives empire and victory, and it is also true that every nation that has gone into war with the preponderance of naval power on its side has won every great conflict in the past. If the United States had had no Navy in 1861, and the Confederacy had been equipped with a navy equal to what the United States had, the Lord only knows whether this people would have been fighting yet or not.

History will bear me out in the statement that the nation that controls the sea is the nation that wins every conflict. You can go back two thousand years or more and you will find that Greece fought her great battle for independence and for her own liberty upon the sea, and that if the Greeks had not been superior on the sea at the battle of Salamis European civilization might have been superseded by that of Persia and of Asia. Sparta was only able to win the supremacy of Greece from Athens when she had created a navy able to contend with and overthrow the former prestige of her brilliant rival upon the seas. Holland won the war of eighty years, together with her liberty, because her power upon the ocean became so great that no Spanish fleet could meet her. Great Britain, that small island in the ocean, with a few millions of people, through her dominance as a sea power, through her great navy, is enabled to maintain far beyond her natural strength an exalted position in the face of the entire world. So it has been through all history.

Mr. DAVIS. What about the American Revolution?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Yes; what about the American Revolution! What do you desire to know about that?

Mr. DAVIS. Did not we come out ahead without a navy?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. We had the navy of Holland, which was then almost equal to the navy of Great Britain, to help us. We had the navy of France, the second great naval power of the world, to help us. We had the navy of Spain to help us; and it was only when with the help of those three great navies that for the time the allied powers became the mistress of the sea, and the combined French and Spanish fleets swept the channel that we first had hope of final victory. When the soldiers of Washington and Rochambeau marched to Yorktown to meet Cornwallis, the mighty French fleet of De Grasse was there to blockade the river to prevent escape or succor by water and to aid in compelling the surrender of the haughty British lord and his 7,000 soldiers. Truly, it can be said that the preponderance obtained by our allies on the sea did much to win for us that independence which has enabled us to take such high rank among the world's great powers.

In 1812 what did we find to be our condition? We went to war with Great Britain then, and Great Britain had on her hands not only the Republic of the United States, but she was also engaged in that long and deadly combat with France, under the guidance of the military skill and genius of Napoleon the Great. Then our small Navy, here and there, was enabled to occasionally win a battle. When, with equal numbers, we met the British on the sea they were often forced to give way and haul down their flag before American skill, American capacity to command, and American bravery upon the high seas.

But nevertheless, what was the condition of our country before that war had ended? Great Britain blockaded every port we had; her fleet came here and her soldiers burned the American Capitol under our eyes; she drove our commerce from the sea; while the distress, misery, and ruin resulting from the blockade and the interruption of commerce were so great in New England that before that struggle ended New England for the first time in her history became unpatriotic and threatened to precede the Southern States in secession by a period of forty-five years. That was the condition to which we were reduced the last time we were forced into war with a great naval power that had command of the sea. I hope never to behold such a condition in my time. We have it in our power to prevent a renewal of such scenes. I believe we intend to do our part.

Again, I say that it is a scandal, a shame, and an indignity in the face of civilization that the richest nation of all the nations, the most populous collection of civilized people that has ever been seen under one flag, that a country more exposed to plunder and spoliation than any other in the world, a nation that has a great name and a great history behind her, one that proclaims that it is led and guided by one of the most advanced and enlightened of the human races, should permit it to be said at any time or under any circumstances that her forts, her harbors, and her flag can be insulted for want of sufficient patriotism among her citizens to vote the few paltry thousands of dollars necessary to give her a Navy that would defend her in time of need, and make her equal to any and all upon all the waters of the earth where her flag has to be seen. [Applause.]

Now, one word more and then I shall be through. I believe that we are going to vote this appropriation. We are going to vote it because it is necessary. We are going to vote it because the Administration and the Secretary of the Navy recommend it and say that it is necessary. We are going to vote it because we do not desire to see our commerce unprotected. We are going to vote it because in time of peace we should prepare for war. We are going to vote it because we have ceased to be demagogues and intend as far as we can to be far-seeing statesmen. We are going to vote it because we do not desire that in any future time of stress or difficulty we shall be compelled to reproach ourselves that when we had the opportunity we failed to prepare, instead of waiting until the war had come upon us, as other nations have sometimes done in the past.

The Navy is popular. The American people love it, and they will not count as wasted the money that Congress may expend to improve it, to maintain and increase it. Its achievements are the proudest in our history and are treasured in every heart that beats with national pride and swells with the recollection of the deeds of a not soon to be forgotten past. In our school days we read of Decatur, of Lawrence, of Hull, of Paul Jones, and of Perry, and while their memory lasts we shall be true to its lessons and true in devotion to the flag, as they were in other days.

We are going to have these three great battle ships because we need them, because we can have them, and because money is not so dear to us as national prestige. England is now spending one hundred millions to renew her fleets. She knows her interests and her patriots are awake. Shall we fear to risk fifteen or twenty millions for ourselves? Every American will say no.

We are going to have them because we are proud of our name, because we are proud of our race, and intend that while America is free, while she is great and powerful, the flag that has come down to us from our fathers shall remain unspotted and be kept high up so long as it is in our care and keeping, and because we have determined to at all times and under all circumstances keep and fully maintain our country where she ought to be, among the greatest, the most powerful, and the most respected nations in the world. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, the present naval appropriation bill carries $6,000,000 in excess of last year. I am not disposed to refer to what might on the surface appear to be a failure on the part of the committee to respond to the evident situation of the Treasury. On the other hand, I am disposed to think that every dollar authorized by the committee ought to be appropriated; and I have already had enough experience in dealing with public opinion on questions of appropriations to know that no partisan advantage arises from the parade of statistics of our appropriations if the public be satisfied that the money is wisely appropriated and honestly expended.

There are possibly only two items in dispute in the bill which the committee has reported—the increase recommended by the Department for the enlisted force of the Navy and an appropriation to begin the construction of certain battle ships and torpedo vessels. Though I do not live upon the seaboard, I have always since I have been a member of this House thought it wise to encourage the building of the new American Navy. I believe that the people of the Mississippi Valley are interested both from sentimental and practical considerations in the construction of such a fleet as will enable the United States at all times to maintain the safety and dignity of the country.

I do not know that anything ought to be said by way of criticism of the fact that the present management of the Committee on Naval Affairs seems to be able to anticipate the construction of a magnificent fleet without the expense of a very bewildering sum of money. I am almost led to emphasize the skill with which my colleagues on the Committee on Naval Affairs have managed to provide for torpedo vessels, for cruisers, and for battle ships of the largest type upon an aggregate cash appropriation of, I believe, less than $500,000. [Laughter.] The enterprise is magnificent, but not less magnificent than the enterprise of the committee in loading the expense on the next and succeeding Congresses. [Renewed laughter.] I do not, however, wonder at that, for, as the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. PENDLETON] so curiously admitted a moment ago—

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Will my colleague allow me an interruption?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Is not turn about fair play?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think the Republican management of the Naval Committee was ever able to accomplish so splendid a feat of financiering as my friend from Maryland has accomplished in this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Did not the Fifty-first Congress load us down pretty heavily?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We loaded ourselves down after we had been defeated at the polls.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Fifty-first Congress made a substantial appropriation to carry on the construction of the ships that were authorized, and I do not think that can be said of the appropriations made in this bill. But I do not intend to insist upon criticism of this character, because the Democratic party has always enjoyed throughout the United States a first-class reputation for friendship to the American Navy on about as small a contribution of funds to its upbuilding as can easily be imagined. [Laughter.] The Republican party has had great difficulty in extorting even from the friends of the cause a recognition of its service and friendly activity in its behalf.

The people most interested in the construction of ships seem to regard the indifference, even the hostility, of the Democratic party as of more importance to them than the cooperation and aid of the Republican voters of the United States and their Representatives in this House. In six years the Democratic party has contributed, according to our records, only an insignificant fraction of their votes to any proposition looking toward the restoration of the American fleet; and to-day throughout the country nearly everybody that I have met believes that Secretary Whitney, in the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland, was the author and practically the finisher of the naval projects of the Government. Yet the record and history of the case show that the full plan of the new American Navy antedates the Administration of Mr. Whitney, and that it has been carried forward in this House and in the Executive Departments by the aid, counsel, and support of the Republican party.

The Democratic party, even when in charge of the Government, has not effectively advised any progress in the construction of the new ships. At the beginning of the Fifty-third Congress the Secretary of the Navy, then fresh from the chairmanship of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, made bold, contrary to his whole record while a member of this House, to recommend an enlarged appropriation for additions to the fleet. That recommendation was supervised by the Chief Magistrate and it was practically annulled, so far as its influence on this House was concerned, by that portion of the message of President Cleveland in which he suggested that the depleted condition of our Treasury ought to impress Congress with the idea that there was not much propriety in further appropriations for new work in the construction of naval vessels.

I am glad to observe that in the course of two years the Secretary of the Navy has been able to convert the Chief Magistrate to a more liberal naval policy, for I find in his message sent to Congress in the present session that the President seems to have somewhat broadened his views as to our naval policy. He suggests the construction of battle ships and cruisers and torpedo boats, saying that if we are to have a navy for warlike operations, offensive and defensive, we certainly ought to increase the number both of the battle ships and of the torpedo boats.

He goes further, and shows symptoms of returning reason in the field of practical affairs by some observations which, while they are true, must sound strange, if not unreasonable, to the great mass of his followers in this House. He says that the manufacture of armor plates requires an extensive plant and the aggregation of many skilled workmen.

All the armor necessary to complete the vessels now building will be delivered before the 1st of June next. If no new contracts are given out, the contractors must disband their workmen and their plants must lie idle. Battle ships authorized at this time would not be well under way until late in the coming fiscal year. At least three years and a half from the time of the contract would be required for their completion. The Secretary states that not more than 15 per cent of the cost of such ships would need to be included in the appropriations for the coming year.

We have here the President of the United States solemnly urging upon a Democratic Congress, which in one way or another has managed to cripple nearly all the great industrial plants of the country, to stand by the upbuilding of the American Navy in order that the iron and steel manufacturers of the United States may have employment for their workmen and occupation for their great establishments.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That will beat the bill, will it not?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am afraid that will beat the bill, because, so far as my observation extends, I have never yet met a thoroughly organized free-trade Democrat or Populist, like my friend from Kansas, who seemed to have the slightest notion that it makes any difference what becomes of the industrial plants of the United States so that we secure our fair share of the markets of the world.

Now, I agree perfectly with the President that not only the safety and dignity of the country require the continued progress of our fleet, but that in these times of poverty, idleness, and misfortune it is well for the country to continue, so far as its patronage will contribute to that result, the operation and the activity of the great machine shops that have been called into existence by the policy of the Government in respect to the Navy of the United States.

There was a time, as I have often heard my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] say, when few people in the United States believed that the industrial skill of our own country would ever be able to supply either the armor or the guns needed for the American Navy. I believe that in its history no more practical service will be found than that service rendered not only to the Navy, but to the industries of the nation by my friend from Maine, when, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he insisted in this House that it was better for us to go without the ships until we had developed, by the genius and industry of our own people, the ability to make the materials entering into their construction. [Applause.] To-day nothing that is required in the construction or the equipment of a ship need be bought anywhere outside of our own country, and Mr. Cleveland is right in holding that in times like these the occupation of these great centers of industry is a worthy and fit motive to influence Congress in the pursuit of its national policy.

I do not believe in the suggestion of my friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] that we ought not to do anything further in this direction until we see whether the battle ships and the other modern war vessels are to be the final and permanent type of naval architecture. There might have been some force in such a suggestion at the beginning. The transition from sailing vessels and ships of wood to the iron and steel ships of to-day was a transition so great that a nation might well and safely have waited for the success of experiments in that direction before making the change, and I believe there was a real wisdom in the fact that we did not begin the construction of the steel fleet of the United States until the experiments of other nations had warranted us in the conclusion that a final and permanent type of naval architecture had been reached.

It can not be possible that the inventive genius of man will ever render these specimens of naval architecture which the nations of the world are now building obsolete or ineffective. We have had, of course, in this country no little trouble in the production of armor plate, and last summer it fell to my lot, as a member of the Naval Committee of this House, to enter with some minuteness into the examination of charges of fraud preferred in some quarters against a great steel firm engaged in the production of armor plate for the war ships of the United States.

It is not out of place for me to say here, notwithstanding the report of the Naval Committee in the last session, that I do not credit the exaggerated statement sent abroad involving that company in a cheap attempt to defraud the United States and endanger the safety of our armored vessels. It is to my mind hardly credible that an investment of millions employed in a gigantic business, of which the production of armor plate was only an insignificant fraction, was turned into a poor and awkward conspiracy against its customers.

Sickness and the pressure of affairs in the closing hours of the last Congress left me unable to give the attention which I would have given to the report of that committee but for my absence from the Capitol. The report charged fraud and conspiracy upon the steel company at Pittsburg which had for many years been engaged in furnishing armor plate for the ships of the United States. In a general way the evidence taken before that committee warranted severe criticism against the company, yet I for one then agreed and now agree with the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy and with the Secretary, that whatever irregularities occurred at Pittsburg, whatever deceit may have been contrived by the workmen engaged in the construction of these steel plates at the Carnegie Steel Works, no man ought to say that the armor furnished for the new ships of the United States is wanting in strength or efficiency for the service for which they were intended.

I believe that the Secretary of the Navy is right when he says that not one plate has been accepted by the Government which is not above the minimum limit required by the contract. So that whatever irregularities occurred at Pittsburg—and there were many—although, as I have indicated, it was not my fortune to see the report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs before it was submitted to this House in the last session of Congress—whatever irregularities occurred there, the members of this House and the people of the United States may rely with absolute confidence upon the fact that the armor plate furnished is above the minimum limit required by a just construction of the contract with the Carnegie Steel Company.

Whatever weight and force the criticisms of my friend from Kansas may be entitled to, they ought not, in my judgment, to be an influential argument against the further construction of ships by the United States or against the further reliance of Congress upon the steel-producing plants of our own country in furnishing the material for the ships and for the armor of ships.

I wish to say another word. I was interested in what my friend from Kansas had to say about the merchant marine of the United States. My study of the question of reviving the merchant marine of the United States convinces me that it is not only a question of commerce, but a military question; and if I had the guidance of the naval policy of the United States I would put the Navy and the mercantile marine in strict partnership and build both of them at the same time.

I was struck in reading the newspapers the other day by the fact that the splendid officer who conducted the French line steamer La Gascogne to the port of New York was a lieutenant in the French navy, detailed by his Government for the command of that merchant and passenger, ship which, under contract with the French Government, is at any time available for all the purposes of war or peace.

I had the pleasure not long ago of reading a book which has occasioned, perhaps, the most friendly criticism of our Navy in every capital of the world—the work of Captain Mahan on The Influence of Sea Power in History. One thing which that great student and writer lays down seems to me to be absolutely true—that the basis of a successful navy is a merchant fleet, which in time of peace is a training school of seamanship and in time of war may be converted to all naval purposes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think that these battle ships loaded down with armor plate would be available for the merchant marine?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, I do not intend to debate with “the sage of Medicine Lodge” about the utility of war ships in the fleet of the United States or of any nation in the world. I am not a practical seaman, but I know—

Mr. SIMPSON. It seems that your logic, like the steel plates furnished by Mr. Carnegie, is full of flaws.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My idea is that the gentleman's knowledge of logic and his knowledge of ships of war are about on a parity. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I am in favor of “maintaining the parity.”

Mr. BOUTELLE (to Mr. SIMPSON). You must have made a terrible hole in your “reserve.” [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. There is not a nation in the world that has not studied the question of battle ships—not one; and I put their science and their knowledge against the enthusiasm of my friend from Kansas. [Laughter.] He says that the ships of Japan sunk the ships of China. That is true. I do not suppose that the genius of man or the wisdom of God could make a ship and man it with Chinese sailors which could not be sunk by the military genius of the rising Empire of Japan. [Applause.] Put American seamen on the Chinese torpedo boats and they would have sunk the ships of Japan. Put Chinese sailors on the battle ships of the United States and the torpedo boats of any country in the world would probably sink them.

So that my friend is entirely wrong and I think unwise in undertaking to draw at short range any lesson for us from the experience of Japan, although he has as an example the Secretary of the Navy himself, who in a recent review has undertaken to throw the light of Chinese experience upon the naval policy of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

I am in favor of torpedo boats; and I intend to introduce an amendment to this bill when we come to consider it by paragraphs, requiring two such boats to be built on the Father of Waters, in the valley of the Mississippi. [Applause.] I am in favor of gunboats; and I believe our naval policy will one day do the dispatch business of the Navy not by costly ships, but by gunboats and light-draft vessels. I am in favor of cruisers—swift, well armed, well equipped—for all emergencies of war and of peace. But above all, I am in favor of the battle ship, equipped by the best artillery produced by the science of the world and ready everywhere to defend against all comers the safety and the dignity of the great Republic. [Applause.]

Of course these great enterprises involve large expenditures and can not be conducted without money or price. But, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing about the expenditure in this connection that I rather like, and that is that every dollar expended goes to our own people, to our own capital, to our own labor, to our own industrial system, and we lose nothing as a nation by thus giving patronage and support to the activities of the American people. [Applause.]

But I started out to say a few moments ago that behind the Navy lies the merchant fleet of this country. We have had before us already and passed a bill, whose wisdom I do not question, that put under the American flag two great ships, the Paris and New York, requiring their owners to duplicate them at some American shipyard, which they are about to do or are now doing. In fact one of the two has been recently launched in Philadelphia.

I want to live long enough to see our American shipyards made active as they have never been heretofore in all of our history by the construction of an American merchant fleet. [Applause.] The Chief Magistrate of the United States, with a purpose which I am not entirely able to fathom, seems to appreciate the importance of keeping busy the great steel-producing plants now established in this country, and yet before he finishes his message to Congress he recommends that we abandon the struggling shipyards of our own countrymen, and whenever we want to purchase a ship go abroad, buy a ship there ready made, and put it on the high seas under the American flag!

The wisdom, I repeat, of that suggestion I can not quite fathom. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas, who has echoed on this floor that suggestion of the President of the United States, that if we have got to sacrifice the business of building ships in order to acquire the business of sailing them, I for one would not be willing to make this sacrifice under any conditions or circumstances. [Applause.] It is needless for my friend from Kansas to say that the high protective tariff has driven the American merchant marine from the sea because it has prevented the building of American ships. It is needless for him to say that the cost of the material entering into the construction of a ship by reason of the tariff has made it impossible for the shipyards of America to produce ships for our own commerce.

That statement is not borne out by facts. The gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, justly and promptly suggested to my friend from Kansas that for a quarter of a century and more the materials that enter into the construction of ships for the foreign trade of this country have been free by our laws, and if my friend from Kansas, who for four beautiful years past has been doing the spectacular act before his countrymen as the friend and spokesman of labor on this floor, will take time to investigate the matter for himself he will find that the only way for us to build ships in competition with the Clyde is to sacrifice the level of American life and the wages of American labor. [Applause.] For my part, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to do either, whether on the advice of the gentleman from Kansas or of the President of the United States. [Renewed applause.]

On the contrary, to come to a practical view of the matter, I have made up my mind that the only way the American people will ever regain their ascendancy upon the high seas is by pursuing rigidly the policy which has enabled their competitors to monopolize the carrying trade of the world, and that is out of the general resources of the country to subsidize—and I do not hesitate to use the word which has beaten every bill for the upbuilding of the merchant marine that has been introduced here within my recollection—to subsidize the carrying trade as France has done, as Germany has done, as Great Britain has done, and thus put our seamen and ship owners on an equal footing with the rest of the world and enable them to enter into a competition which shall in time enable us to regain the honored position on the high seas which we once held in the commerce of the world. [Applause.]

I do not know whether it will be done or not, but I intend to stand here advocating that policy toward the merchant marine of the United States whether it be adopted or not. If compelled to choose between closing out the shipbuilding industry of the United States, a thing that would not only destroy the merchant marine, but also our national independence, if accomplished, and temporarily losing the carrying trade of the seas, I shall stand by the home shipyards and let foreign commerce take care of itself. [Applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-eight minutes. Mr. DINGLEY. I will reserve the time which has been yielded to me by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will ask the gentleman from Texas if he wishes to occupy any time now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL].

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I only wanted to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who appears to control the opposition to this bill, how much time he desires to use at this point? We have occupied about an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he did not know there had been any arrangement made.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. There has not been any such definite arrangement, but I thought it was due to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to inquire of him if there was any gentleman in opposition to the bill to whom he wished to yield.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] wishes to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to give notice that when we reach line 15, on page 2 of this bill, under the five-minute rule, I shall offer the following amendment to it:

Provided further, That hereafter only one-half of the vacancies in the grades of captain and commander in the line of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the following numbers, namely: Captains, 40; commanders, 40.

Now, my reason for that is this, and I want to ask the members of the Naval Committee if I misstate any facts with regard to this matter that they will correct me.

I hold in my hand the Naval Register for January 1, 1895. In that Naval Register I find 45 captains. Of that number of captains I find that 13 are at sea.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. By promotion in your amendment do you mean promotion from the grade of captain?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. No, I do not. Now, by the Naval Register for the date I mention I find that out of 45 captains there are 13 at sea and 32 on shore. Out of the 85 commanders there are 14 at sea and 71 on shore. Then, putting them together, of the 130 commanding officers we find 37 of them at sea and 107 on shore, or, in other words, four-fifths of the commanding officers of the Navy are not performing sea service.

Taking the most extreme cases, of captains having the greatest sea service under present commission, the greatest length of sea service is three years in a period of ten years and three months.

Now, how can we increase the efficiency of a Navy of 130 commanding officers, including commanders and captains, when out of these 130 men only 27 are on sea duty? In other words, such a policy as that does not increase the efficiency of that class of people.

I would say, in the place of 130 commanding officers I would have 80. This would still give them a little less than one-half of their time at sea and would increase the efficiency of the service by skilling these officers in sea duties. Now, the commanding officer having greatest sea service under the present commission has four years and eleven months of sea service out of a total of twelve years and eight months. Eighteen of the 45 captains have had less than one year's service, and eight of them have had none at all.

I think when we are appropriating money for the naval service we ought to consider whether we are increasing the efficiency of the Navy when we have 130 commanding officers, and out of that number only 37 of them are at sea.

But we find that out of the 718 line officers in the United States Navy 294 are at sea and more than one-seventh, or 105, are in Washington city to-day. Now, there is a reason for that. I dare make this statement, that there are more line officers of the Navy to-day in the city of Washington now than there have been in a period of fifteen years.

Mr. BLACK. What are they doing here?

Mr. WISE. Reorganization!

Mr. HALL of Missouri. The question of reorganization of the personnel of the Navy is up; and they are here, as I understand, and am credibly informed, working in that line. I say, give these men something to do by sending them to sea.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. Does the gentleman say that any naval officer is here, except upon a detail of some sort?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Oh, I suppose not.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Or on leave?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I suppose not.

Mr. MONEY. Do you mean to say that they were detailed here for the purpose of working on this bill?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. No one can have the information to assert that positively.

Mr. MONEY. Then you do not mean anything?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I say it so happens accidentally, if you wish to put it in that way, but it seems to me very passing strange.

Mr. MONEY. Put it in your own language. I only want to know what you mean.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. It appears that there happen to be, then, we will say accidentally, perhaps, more line officers in the city of Washington at the time this bill for the reorganization of the personnel of the Navy is pending, than have been known to be here at one time in the history of the Navy, for many years.

Mr. MONEY. That is just a change in the phraseology of the sentence.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I say let these men go to sea. I wish to know if any member of the Naval Committee denies any statement contained in the Naval Register? The Naval Register shows the fact which I have stated, and I propose, when we come to line 15, page 2 of the bill, to move to decrease the number of these line officers, to the end that we may have them at least one-third of their time engaged in sea service, which will make them more efficient in the performance of their duty.

Mr. MEYER. Does not the Naval Register state the kind of duty in which every officer is employed?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Why, certainly; and I will say that I do not believe it is necessary that men having the experience needed in commanding officers, either as captains or commanders of the line, should be here in Washington performing clerical duties. They are as follows:

REAR-ADMIRALS.

Mr. MEYER. Is the gentleman prepared to state that the duties to which these officers are assigned are not required, and that they are here merely in a formal way; that the duties assigned are not essential to the needs of the service?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Oh, I suppose they are doing some duty, some of them. A great many of them are on leave. But why are you defending a system under which, out of 130 commanding officers, men whose duty and experience fit them for the command of vessels, only 27 are at sea and 103 are on shore? Is our Navy at sea, or is it on shore?

Mr. MEYER. Is the gentleman prepared to state, from a view of the Naval Register, that any of those captains to whom he has referred are not employed on duty that is required, and that is important and essential to the proper conduct of the Navy?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I have not gone through it item by item or name by name to see what positions these men are filling. But I do believe that a great many of them are here nominally on duty, but actually are performing none except working for some bill in which the are interested.

Mr. MEYER. That is merely belief.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Their place is at sea, and we should cut down their numbers so as to keep them at sea.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, it is very much to be regretted by me, and perhaps by the House, that the duty of defending the new construction of the American Navy should have devolved upon me instead of upon some member of that committee who from longer service is more familiar with the subject-matter under discussion and the necessities of the Navy. But, Mr. Chairman, I would not presume to ask the attention of this House if I could not derive from a study of this question abundant reason why this appropriation should be adopted.

I will not undertake to say that these gentlemen who oppose this feature of the bill, gentlemen who have been distinguished for their wisdom and their experience in legislative matters, gentlemen who have constituted themselves, and honorably so, the "watch-dogs of the Treasury," men who have guarded carefully and jealously the public Treasury and the public interests, are not actuated by motives strictly as honest as my own. But, Mr. Chairman, a great deal is to be attributed to point of view and the amount of study; and while I recognize the ability and patriotism of those gentlemen I believe that their position on this subject springs from a shallow knowledge of the subject.

Now, the question is whether or not we shall have a navy commensurate with the necessities of a great nation like the United States of America. I will also say of those gentlemen who have arrayed themselves in opposition to this measure, that if this flag should be insulted, if a speck of war were to be seen in the now unclouded sky, and if the storm should burst in fury upon our coasts, those who deal with the Navy in so niggardly a manner would be quite as prompt, quite as generous and patriotic as I or any other man in voting the amount necessary for defending the honor of the flag and protecting the interests of this great nation.

Believing that to be true, yet I conceive that these gentlemen have assumed the position they have because they do not know what the necessities of this country are in that respect. It is not because they have not the intelligence to grapple with this subject, but because other special duties have been particularly devolved upon them which have absorbed their attention and energy.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask what is the necessity for an American Navy? It is true, as I will concede to these gentlemen, that we are enjoying the most friendly relations with other nations of the earth. There is no man who will say, from present indications, that there is a probability that those peaceful relations will soon or ever be disturbed. While we are at peace with all other nations, no one knows how soon we may become involved in a foreign war.

I am a peaceful man, and yet I have had personal difficulties in which I did not think I was at fault. The nations may be peaceful and just, and yet aggrieved. And so we may be called upon to defend the flag, to protect the persons and the property of citizens of the United States. It is true that we have exemptions from the chances of war that are enjoyed by few, or probably none, of the great nations of the world. The physical fact of our isolation gives us in a great measure that exemption. We have no foreign dependencies, no extended colonies to defend. We have no widespread commerce that would call upon us for the maintenance of a large navy or that would involve us in a war with a foreign country.

Mr. SICKLES. But we will have the commerce.

Mr. MONEY. I hope the prediction of my gallant friend will soon be verified. I hope the time is not far distant when not the white sail, but the black smoke that belches from an American merchant marine shall blot the blue skies of other countries, when the keels of our vessels shall vex the still waters of the harbors of all nations while we carry the product of American industry and energy to the remotest marts of commerce. Then it may be that contact and attrition may involve us in a war for which we stand confessedly unprepared.

But, Mr. Chairman, although there is no apparent necessity for a large or powerful Navy to-day, as the white wings of peace spread over our country, yet there are here 70,000,000 of aggressive people of the ardent, conquering Anglo-Saxon stock, with their aggressive blood coursing through their veins. They are not willing to brook insult or tolerate wrong, and they will not be content with a peace, enforced by an ineffective Navy, but they demand a Navy that will command the peace.

No nation can so readily secure peace as by being prepared for war.

Mr. SICKLES. When we can whip them they do not want to fight us.

Mr. MONEY. Well, I reckon we shall always be able to whip them some way or other. In saying that I count upon the reserved energy and the inherent traits of the American character. But the time for improvising a navy has passed away. All this talk about destroying the commerce of an enemy by a few fleet cruisers has become nonsense since steam has supplanted sails. A cruiser must keep the ocean. She must zigzag over the face of the globe, and she must be within reach of port; she must have a base of supplies or she ceases to work; and where have we, outside of our own borders, a base of supplies, a naval station? Gentlemen who talk about privateers as a means of destroying the commerce of a hostile nation are simply talking of the history of the past. It is true that in the old sailing days, even when the great overpowering navy of England dominated the ocean, the French privateers in one year destroyed over 400 English vessels; but those French privateers had their bases of operation and supplies at Guadeloupe and Martinique, and when the English captured those two islands they broke up completely the wholesystem of French privateering.

But, Mr. Chairman, the necessity for a navy is to be considered not only with reference to the chances of war but also in relation to the magnitude of the interests of this country that are to be protected. It may be, and I hope it will be, that we shall enjoy a long season of peace, with its fruitful gains; but the immense interests that are involved furnish ample reasons for the upbuilding of a navy for their protection. My distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] says that he sympathizes with the men who work in the cotton field, in the wheat field, and in the manufacturing, but does he not know that on the first outbreak of war between this country and any of the five great nations of Europe, or even some second-class European power, our ports could be hermetically sealed, and the men who labor in the cotton fields and the wheat fields and the factories would find that our exports and their employment would cease?

We have to-day a commerce amounting annually to nearly one and a half billions of dollars. That commerce goes somewhere, and in the event of a war, without a fleet ready and able to protect our harbors, our ports, and our commerce, we would be as the Confederacy was, with a blockade not only on paper but effective, and then the constriction caused by a cordon of ships around the American coast would mean the stagnation and decay of American industries.

But objection seems to be made especially to battle ships. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] and some other gentlemen have referred to the Yalu fight. That fight was worth hundreds of millions of dollars to every maritime nation in the world. The gentleman from Kansas seems to believe that it established the fact that armored cruisers can fight battle ships. That is the lesson he draws from that fight. The gentleman was never so entirely wrong in his life. He reads the lesson of that fight as the Chinese and Japanese read their books, backwards, from right to left, and from the end of the book to the beginning.

The lesson of the Yalu fight, if it taught anything, was that armored cruisers can not fight successfully against battle ships. That fight taught them that the rapid-fire guns made the superstructure of the armored cruisers useless. It taught the fact that new signal methods are necessary, because the halyards were shot away from the Chinese flagship in fifteen minutes, and there was not a single maneuver performed by the Chinese during that five hours' fight. The Japanese, on the contrary, well disciplined and well trained, signaled continually and maneuvered promptly and correctly, and the result was that those men, trained and brave, with an insufficient fleet, armor, and armament, almost destroyed the whole of the great Chinese fleet because they had not only the advantage of training, but they also knew the incapacity of their adversaries.

If it had not been for two Chinese battle ships, armed and armored according to modern science, the whole Chinese fleet would have gone to the bottom, and if it had not been for several American and European officers on board those Chinese battle ships, they too would probably have been destroyed. Mr. Chairman, the battle ship will be hereafter, as it is to-day, the great reliance in naval warfare. It will be to the naval combat what the infantry is to the army. The cruiser may be a scout; she may maintain the dignity of the country by exhibiting the majesty and power of the American people as symbolized abroad by her flag, but in the naval battles of the future the battle ship and the torpedo boat are the vessels that will give effective results.

My friend from Kansas says that the torpedo boats can sink in a few minutes one of these great battle ships that cost so many millions of dollars. Now, as a matter of fact, in a great sea fight, especially with sea way, the torpedo boat is useless. When the torpedo boats sunk the Chinese battle ships those ships were at anchor in a small harbor, so that it was almost like target practice. When the Aquidaban was sunk she was at anchor, and when the Esmeralda was sunk in the harbor of Valparaiso she was at anchor. But in the Yalu fight not one of the torpedo boats was effectively used. On the contrary the torpedoes were thrown overboard because of the fear of their being exploded by the rapid-fire guns of the adversary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be, perhaps, that this House will listen to such landlubbers and fresh-water sailors as the gentleman from Kansas in opposition to the old salts of the Naval Committee [laughter]; but I want to say that those gentlemen whose business it has been to inquire into these matters are, I believe, unanimously of the opinion that it is necessary for the building up of our Navy that we should have these battle ships. Let us suppose, Mr. Chairman, that some affair like that of the Virginian should happen to-morrow, or something like the Martin Kostza affair, and we should assert ourselves, what preparation have we made to receive the onset of our enemies? I want to show gentlemen a strategic map of the United States, so as to give them an object lesson.

We may take it for granted that Great Britain is the power with which we should be most likely to have to contend, because the two nations have a coterminous frontier of over 3,000 miles; because she has all along our eastern front and far beyond our border in the north, and far below us on the south, a cordon of naval stations, dockyards and shipyards designed to hold in check the progress of this giant republic. I want to show gentlemen of the House by this map that in the event of a war with Great Britain there is not a single obstacle to prevent tribute being levied upon every city on our coast from Portland, Me., to Galveston, Tex. Our whole squadron combined could not stop for five minutes the progress of a squadron of British battle ships and armed cruisers. I ask the attention of gentlemen to this map. Those red circles which are marked upon it are British dockyards and naval stations upon their own territory. In addition to that, Great Britain has 70 or 80 coaling stations where her ships can go at once to renew their supplies of coal. I have a list of those stations here.

I will not stop to read it now, but with the permission of the House I will insert it in an appendix to this speech. Now, what have we to resist the onslaughts of a nation like Great Britain, with a fleet of 251 fighting vessels, with bases of supplies for munitions of war and provisions all along our coast and reaching away down into the Caribbean Sea and off the coast of South America? If any other nation should attack us, being across the Atlantic so far from its base of supplies, it could bring to the attack only its vessels of great coal endurance, vessels whose radius of action must be many thousand miles. The radius of action of a war ship is the distance that it can travel with a full supply of coal moderately used, but the effective radius is only one-third of that distance, because one-third of the coal will be required to take the vessel to the point of action; one-third will be used in effective operations, and the remaining third to return the vessel to its base of supply.

But out of the 251 ships that compose the fighting navy of Great Britain to-day, we must assume that a great many would be left for the defense of her shores. We must not suppose that she would strip the Channel and the Mediterranean and all her great provinces and independencies of their defense, leaving her commerce unprotected, at the mercy of cruisers. Yet out of that fleet of 251 vessels she could bring not only those of great coal endurance, but those of limited coal endurance to attack us. She could rely upon these bases of supplies. She could blow out of the water and destroy any fleet that the American nation could bring against her, and could establish herself on our main land at any place convenient to her.

This a picture of what might occur. It is not improbable; it certainly is not impossible. It devolves upon us then to say whether we shall live confessedly unprepared for war. If we should follow the course which would commend itself to a man of military ability, when Great Britain attacks us we should first upon a declaration of war hurl our forces upon those bases of supplies and capture her stations and dockyards. Have we the force to do that? Can we defend even the harbor of New York? Our monitors are suited only to still waters. They could not fire a gun while in seaway.

I say that in the event of war we have not the power to make the first attack even upon Great Britain's naval stations and bases of supplies. We should lie absolutely at her mercy. Does it become the honor of a great nation to be subject to the clemency or forbearance of any other nation on the face of the earth? We should, as Andrew Jackson said, prepare for war in time of peace as the best preservative of peace. When that great Hollander, De Witt, bewailed bitterly the parsimony of the Dutchmen he said: "In times of peace, even though there be fear of rupture, their parsimony will not allow them to make sacrifices of money in order that they may defend themselves beforehand."

We stand here then with the greatest security that any people can have in a ready navy. It is not necessary for us to compete with the great nations of the earth in the size of our Navy. We want only self-defense. I do not suppose we are about to launch out in a new policy of aggression. Yet, gentlemen of this House, you who to-day are voting for the Nicaragua Canal, you who insist upon the annexation of Hawaii, I ask you what would be the necessity of a navy if those two feats of national statesmanship should be accomplished? You will then have need for a navy that will not be a mere defense of our coast.

Here is a nation spreading from ocean to ocean, with over 13,000 miles of seacoast absolutely undefended. What are fortifications against battle ships? We know that in recent years a single iron-clad battle ship for six months dominated the whole Republic of Brazil. She fought all the forts in the harbor of Rio Janeiro. She fought the Government, and fought it successfully, until her supplies were exhausted. And to-day half a dozen battle ships of the first class can drive before them anything in the American navy to reach the harbor of New York. There is at that point an aggregation of over three millions, perhaps, of our people. Their commerce would be destroyed; their railroad communications with the balance of the country cut off. They would be left to starve, but for the magnanimity of the conqueror. Yet we here, upon the consideration of a few million dollars, are hesitating whether we shall put ourselves in an attitude of successful resistance to the attack of this or any other nation of the world.

Mr. Chairman, in this discussion I want to state the position of my opponents just as fairly as they could state it themselves. This is no occasion for party politics; this is no occasion for dissimulation. Let us deal fairly with each other and with the country. There is a great demand to-day, I believe, among the American people for a navy adequate to protect the honor and the commerce of this great country. Let us respond to that demand as statesmen and patriots, and see that the Republic shall suffer no detriment.

If, in the course of my remarks, any gentleman should doubt the correctness of any statement I may make, or if he desires to question me upon any point, I will yield with the greatest pleasure; for I am here to-day without any special interest in the Navy. I represent an agricultural and inland district; but my heart throbs responsive to the patriotic demands of this Republic. I, for one, desire to protect her honor and her interest.

A great deal has been said to-day about the inutility of the battle ship; and I regret to say that my distinguished friend from Iowa, a member of the committee, allowed himself to join the company of those gentlemen who congratulate themselves that we have done nothing in the last fifteen or twenty years toward building up our Navy. I do not propose to join that company, who, it seems to me, stand in the position of a business man who would congratulate himself that for ten, twelve, or fifteen years he had not been insured and meanwhile his house had not caught fire. The gentlemen here to-day who refuse this further appropriation to build a navy are in the position of the business man who can not believe it necessary to insure his edifice until it is on fire.

I also regret that my friend from Iowa took occasion to say of our distinguished Secretary of the Navy that he has attempted to shed a Chinese light upon the result of the Yalu fight, thereby virtually admitting the charge made by the gentleman from Kansas that armed cruisers had successfully resisted battle ships.

My friend from Iowa either has not read the article alluded to, or he has forgotten it, for in that very article the distinguished Secretary of the Navy took special occasion to say that the armored cruisers could not fight the battle ships, and said it over and over again as plainly as a man could say anything, and I think that verdict is supported by the best naval talent the world over, wherever this question has been considered.

I have had the pleasure of reading some of the English papers upon the subject, the Globe, the Pall Mall Gazette, and others, and these papers embody the reports of foreign officers in reference to this battle, and the unanimous opinion expressed in each of them, with one single exception, is that the battle ship can destroy the armored cruiser anywhere, and that at last the only safety in a great naval combat is the battle ship of the line.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] doubts the stability of these battle ships. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is not a matter of opinion; it is a matter of practical demonstration. We know their stability, and it has been tested. Why, Great Britain has just launched two of the most magnificent battle ships afloat, of 15,000 tons displacement, that cost nearly $8,000,000. She has 43 great battle ships, besides 10 in process of construction, and do you believe that that great nation, with all of her vast expenditures and experience in the construction and maintenance of her navy, would continue to expend millions in such faulty constructions, and build battle ships that would not be the best vessels afloat for the purposes intended?

As a matter of fact, the great battle ship is the most stable gun platform that ever floated on the bosom of the ocean. It is the only ship that is entirely seaworthy and at the same time capable of war offensive and defensive. And my friend also suggested that a little Japanese gunboat of some insignificant size went through that mélée, not a naval combat, with the Chinese and came out in safety, although pierced with 40 shells, surviving the fight even in this condition.

As a matter of fact, if the gentleman had examined into the matter a little further, he would have ascertained that the Chinese were unprovided with the ammunition necessary and not prepared for a naval combat of this character. They had the very finest of armor-piercing shells that could be bought in Europe or America; but they did not need armor-piercing shells to fight an unarmored ship. These armor-piercing shells cut right through an unarmored vessel, making a smooth, round hole, easily stopped up. But if a half dozen cast-iron shells had been fired into this Japanese unarmored ship, and exploded in the ship, she would have been sunk at once.

The armor-piercing shells simply go through and leave a clean-cut hole, but the cast-iron shell, in its explosion, tears great holes in the ship, disabling and sinking her. But, in connection with that same combat, the Chinese war ship received the impact of 240 immense projectiles fired from 12-inch guns, and another ship of the same fleet received 182 shots, and yet not a single vital part of the ship was affected, although the superstructure crumbled away like cheese before the attack of mice. In addition to that, it is in evidence that the seven American or European officers in command on the ships had to go below and, with pistols and swords, drive to the deck not only the seamen of the Chinese Navy, but the officers themselves as well.

The Japanese seemed to understand the incapacity of their adversaries, and made themselves a tactical blunder that an American or a European officer would have been quick to take advantage of. The squadron in the van of the Japanese fleet was separated more than 4 miles from the body of the fleet. An American or European commanding the Chinese squadron would have turned upon one or the other of the Japanese squadrons and demolished it.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are also told that we do not need battle ships, but that we want vessels for coast defense. What is the best coast defense? There is harbor defense and coast defense. Harbor defenses are made up of forts on the headlands, partly military and partly naval, with a few monitors, floating batteries, torpedoes, and mines in the harbor. But the coast defense is a ship that can take to the sea; not a still-water vessel, but a ship that can ride the waves and stand the storm. And the best defense that can be offered for the commerce of the United States is a battle ship that can cross the Atlantic at any season of the year and fight in a gale if necessary.

Another thing, to protect the commerce of the United States—the best position is not directly on the coast, but is 100, 200, or 500 miles out at sea. Not a ship rocking idly in the harbor, but one that can take the sea and maintain her position in all stress of weather and against all comers.

Allusion has been made to the fact that the Victoria, a great ironclad vessel of the British Navy, was run down and sunk by one of the same fleet, the Camperdown, in a series of tactical evolutions in the Mediterranean. As a matter of fact, reports show that the bulkheads of the Victoria were not closed. This great iron partition, running the entire length of the vessel, with transverse walls running from side to side of the ship, had all of the doors open, and when one side was rammed by the companion ship the water rushed in, the ship listed over to one side, and soon sunk. But that was not the fault of the principle involved in the construction; the fault lay somewhere else. No vessel on earth could stand a shock like that unless provided with water-tight compartments, which are kept closed. We had an illustration of it a few days ago in the loss of the steamer Elbe, sunk by a collision in the darkness of the night by a steamer on the North Sea.

It matters not, Mr. Chairman, what might have been the cause of the decay of American shipping. As a matter of fact we have to-day an immense coastwise commerce. To say nothing of the ships that cross the broad ocean, we have upon our own shores, engaged in coastwise commerce, one of the most vast and magnificent fleets to be found upon the bosom of the deep anywhere. That, too, is at the mercy of a hostile maritime expedition destined for our shores. That, too, is to be taken into account when the necessity for a great American navy is to be considered.

Are we to have this communication along our seaboard interrupted, a communication upon which depend the business interests of so many millions of our American people? Are we to have a line of constriction drawn about us, our communication cut off, our seaports closed, our exports kept upon our own shores, to bring stagnation to industry and despair to industrial workers?

We can only avoid this by having a fleet that can contend with other fleets and insure the safety of our merchant fleets. It is useless now to multiply the number of cruisers. The Army and the Navy are alike in this particular, that you must have all arms of the service, and we are to-day supplied, I think, sufficiently with cruisers. We do not need them except upon occasion, as I mentioned awhile ago.

But gentlemen tell us that these immense battle ships are to be so costly in their maintenance. Upon that point these gentlemen are again mistaken. It does not cost a third as much to maintain a battle ship as it does to maintain a great cruiser, or commerce destroyer, as it is called. The reason for this is that the battle ship is not intended to cruise, and therefore she keeps at home in time of peace. She is laid up for two-thirds of the year, and the only expense then is her care, and she is only maneuvered sufficiently to keep her machinery in efficient working order and to train her crew. But a cruiser must be always afloat. Why, I had a gentleman ask me the other day if it would not cost $1,000,000 a year to keep one of these battle ships in the service.

As a matter of fact we have never had one of these great battle ships to maintain. But the expense of a great battle ship in the English navy, over 10,000 tons, is $226,000 a year in active service. Put her out of active service for two-thirds of the time, as we would do, and then we will have an expense of something under $100,000 a year. I could give you the figures which it cost to maintain one of our cruisers, amounting to over $225,000, and as high as $300,000 a year.

But that is not an expense incident solely to a modern war ship. The old Lancaster, an old wooden ship, when she was in the service, cost at the rate of $230,000 to $240,000 a year. There is nothing in the adaptability of the battle ship to the purposes of warfare, nothing in her construction, nothing in her armament, nothing in her personnel which should make the expense greater than that of the obsolete fleet of the American Navy. But I had it said to me the other day: "Why, it is a good thing that we did not go into this enterprise before, because if we had built an American Navy ten years ago it would now be obsolete, and would have to be sold for old junk."

Some gentlemen do not seem to understand that the great battle ships which saved the Chinese fleet from destruction at the battle of the Yalu River were both of them over 10 years old. Yet they seemed to be efficient for the purpose for which they were designed.

We have saved our money, but we have no fleet; we have economized, and we are defenseless. Other nations have experimented. They have built war ships and have improved on them; built more, and improved on them; they have spent their money freely but wisely, and the result is that they all have the great fighting navies which we lack.

Gentlemen seem to think that this appropriation is excessive. As a matter of fact the appropriation for this next fiscal year, beginning July next, will not amount to more than $500,000, and for this calendar year it will not be a cent. At the end of three or four years, when the construction is completed, it will have amounted to $5,000,000 or $5,500,000 annually; that is, if we stop at this. But I do not believe that the American people are willing that the American Navy should be arrested in its development. It is imperative upon us that we should proceed systematically in building up the Navy, until we have a navy not so very inadequate to the needs of the American Republic as we have to-day.

Now, the British pursue a very different course. They appropriate a lump sum for five years, and the admiralty is made responsible for the condition of the navy, and is required to carry out the plans for the most scientific enlargement of their fleet. In the five years of the Hamilton programme Great Britain built 70 ships. Seventy ships of war, of which 20 were battle ships of the first class. Immediately upon that five years expiring began the Spencer programme, for another five years, contemplating an addition of 55 more great ships to a navy already the greatest on the face of the globe.

Of course we do not expect to emulate Great Britain. That little island has forty-five colonies, besides any number of dependencies. She has her flag floating over every rock and island of the sea. She has nine great responsible governments under her imperial care. She has her fortifications at Gibraltar, at Malta, at Cyprus, the command of the Isthmus of Suez, the Rock of Aden at the mouth of the Red Sea, all along the coast of India, Australia, the Fiji Islands, along the American coast from Canada to the Caribbean Sea, Esquimaux on the Pacific, and many other places. She has to protect a commerce that approximates $3,000,000,000 a year, and it is necessary for her to have this naval force.

This bill only carries 3 per cent of the annual appropriations for the fiscal year. Only 3 per cent of the vast sums of money expended by the American people in the administration of our public affairs to be devoted to the first arm of the national defense; and yet gentlemen tell us it is extravagant! They tell us it is a burden upon the people under the present circumstances; that times are hard, and the people demand that we should not expend the pitiful sum of 3 per cent of all our annual appropriations for the upbuilding of the Navy!

Great Britain pays out for construction in proportion to amount expended for the navy 29 per cent; France, 27 per cent; Italy, 25 per cent at this time; but Germany, Spain, and a number of the second-class powers are to-day expending three, four, or five times as much as we are upon navies that already greatly preponderate the Navy of the United States. Yet we, the proudest people of the world, the most energetic and the richest people, with the greatest amount of property to be protected, are higgling over the niggardly sum of 3 per cent of our annual appropriations for battle ships!

My friend from Missouri [Mr. HALL] has criticised the distribution and the assignment to duty of the officers of the Navy, and made, as I consider, a reflection upon them unworthy of him and undeserved by them. Those gentlemen of our Navy are not on shore duty without reason. Where are the ships that those gentlemen ought to command? He says he would have them afloat. Afloat on what? We have few ships, comparatively. We have not a single battle ship; two are about finished, and four are building. Where are these gentlemen to go? Are we to disband this magnificent personnel of the Navy because we have been slow and derelict in our duty in giving them ships to command?

We must have well-trained men. Admiral Monk, the great commander of the seventeenth century, knew that the courage, the discipline, drill, and professional pride of his men was more than sufficient for the self-sacrificing heroism of the untrained Dutchmen; and so it will always be. We must have trained men who know their business; men who are willing to go down with the ship if necessary. We want to maintain the esprit de corps of the Navy; and I say to-day that officers of our Navy compare favorably with those of any other navy in the world. The are gentlemen proud of their profession; they have prepared themselves for opportunities; they will prove equal to every demand upon them; and I want to say that I am not afraid to trust the battle ships or the cruisers or anything else to defend the honor of this nation to the hands of such men.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I did not intend in my remarks to speak in regard to the importance of the increase of the battle ships. The present chairman of your committee reported a bill in the Fifty-second Congress for the purpose of putting the Revenue-Cutter Service under the control of the Navy. In that report, made to the Fifty-second Congress, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GRISSENHAIN], your present chairman, stated and quoted from the report of Secretary Tracey that the United States had now enough officers to man the entire Revenue-Cutter Service without any increase in the number of officers. Now, then, the Revenue-Cutter Service was not put under the control of the Navy. That bill was defeated; and now the question that arises is this: As you have no battle ships, why will you have out of 130 men 103 on land and the other 27 on the sea?

Mr. MONEY. There are not more than 27 commands at sea. That is a sufficient answer to your question, unless the gentleman wants to disband the Navy.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not want to disband the Navy.

Mr. MONEY. You want to disband a part of it. I say we have not to-day a personnel sufficient in number. In professional skill it ranks high, but in numbers not enough for the Navy that we ought to have. We have naval stations and dockyards and all sorts of duties to which these gentlemen are assigned.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. How many vessels do you propose to build or commence building under this bill?

Mr. MONEY. The bill provides for three battle ships and twelve torpedo boats.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. How many officers will it take to command those?

Mr. MONEY. I can not say.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. There would not be more than three commanding officers for each, I presume?

Mr. SICKLES. The gentleman should remember that we must educate our officers before we send them afloat.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I will not interrupt the gentleman further.

Mr. MONEY. I want to say in reply to my distinguished friend from Missouri that the time has never been when you could improvise the personnel of a navy. The time has been when you could improvise the material of a navy; but you can not do it now. During the late civil war the United States built gunboats in ninety days; and they penetrated like shuttlecocks through the web and woof of our Southern country. They destroyed our communications and our supplies and captured our cities. The United States also built an immense navy—in number at least—along the seaboard, and put those vessels afloat, keeping up an effectual blockade upon the Confederacy, with the effect of destroying it, because, as I believe, it was that blockade which brought about a conclusion of the war honorable and successful to the Federal armies. But, Mr. Chairman, you can not do the like to-day. It takes now two or three years to complete a ship of war and fit her for service.

Upon what small matters like this appropriation may depend the very life of the great American nation, may depend the safety of our commerce, the property of our people, the lives of our citizens, the honor of our flag, and the integrity of our territory. In the second Punic war, when Carthage and Sicily and Macedonia had made an alliance offensive and defensive against the Roman power, when Hasdrubal was victorious in Spain, and Hannibal had run over Italy from the top to the heel of the boot, and Philip was ready with his Macedonian phalanxes to land upon the Italian coast, one single little fact alone prevented him; that was, he did not have a sea power to meet the Roman fleet that patrolled the Adriatic. What was the result? Hasdrubal at the battle of Metaurus was defeated by Claudius Nero. Hannibal in turn was driven back. Sicily was subdued. Philip never landed a single soldier upon the Italian coast nor engaged in a single action against the armies of Rome.

Suppose that, in lieu of unpreparedness for naval warfare, Philip of Macedon had had a fleet—not equal to the Roman fleet which was then patrolling the whole coast of Africa and the coast of Spain and what is now the coast of France down to Naples—suppose he had had a fleet able to compete even with that small squadron which was all there was on the Adriatic Sea, and that he could have landed his troops on any point along the island of Sicily or upon the Italian coast. What might the result have been? Looking at it now in the light of all these centuries it is highly probable that the Roman Republic would have been overthrown, and Carthage would have been the great dominating empire of the world. And then how many other sequences would have flowed from that changed condition of affairs. Palestine would still have remained an isolated Jewish community. The Christian religion would probably not have prevailed over the world to-day; because it was only the universality of the Roman Empire that made Christianity as we know it possible. But for that great fact it would perhaps have been a tribal religion.

In almost every instance in history it has been found that the chief protection and defense of a nation has been its sea power. And in the light of these historical events, in the light of the teachings of more than two thousand years, we sit supinely here and allow this great arm of national defense to perish beneath our neglect. There have been no great changes of strategy. The lines of battle drawn up by Themistocles four hundred and fifty years before the Christian era at Salamis are still good. Tactics change only as weapons change and as ships change. We are to-day under exactly the same influences, subject to the same vicissitudes, and it behooves us to profit by these lessons of history. We shall be derelict to our constituents, derelict to our great country, recreant to the trust that it has confided in us, if we fail to make this pitiful appropriation for so great a purpose.

Now, I made mention awhile ago of the progress Great Britain was making in the construction of her great fleet; that five years ago under the system then in operation they were building 70 ships. Of this number 10 were great battle ships, 42 were cruisers, and 14 torpedo boats. Since then, under the Spencer programme, 10 more battle ships are being constructed, and 6 first-class protected cruisers, 13 second-class protected cruisers, 2 third-class cruisers, 20 torpedo vessels, and 73 torpedo boats. In France they have 9 battle ships, 23 cruisers, and 3 torpedo boats in process of construction. Germany has building 5 battle ships, 7 cruisers, 7 coast-defense vessels, and 4 torpedo boats. Russia has building 9 battle ships and 16 other war ships. Italy is building 9 battle ships and several cruisers.

Does it seem, Mr. Chairman, possible to you that if these battle ships were the worthless machines that they have been depicted by the gentleman from Kansas these enlightened nations, with all of their experience in shipbuilding, would embark millions and hundreds of millions of money to go through the mere farce of building ships which would be worthless in action and of no value to the country which they are intended to defend?

It is true, however, that in battle everything, after all, depends on the fighting man. I care not how perfect the engine of war may be; I care not how swift the ship, how powerful the guns, how perfect her armament, how heavy her armor, how impenetrable her walls, you must have men to man them, and you must have a man who is capable of commanding to control the whole. You must have a man of courage, a man of ability, a man swift to take advantage of opportunity, a man ready to take the responsibility, a man eager to strike when the occasion arises, like Lord Nelson when he went into action at the head of his fleet at Trafalgar and at the Battle of the Nile.

It depends on the man, and to get the fighting man, to get the man who is capable of commanding men, the man who has the tactical experience and the technical knowledge every representative district in the United States is visited and you take the cream of our youth, generally on competitive examinations, and put them into our Naval Academy and drill and teach them. We fire their hearts by emulation and by the study of the history of our own nation and the history of other nations, instilling into them the heroic principle that it is sweet and glorious to die for one's country, and that to perish at the post of honor is to win immortality.

But what is the naval officer doing now? He stands waiting without a sea duty to perform. He is compelled to shore duty. Why? Is it by choice? Not at all. But they stand impatiently waiting for some action that will give them the employment for which the Government has fitted them. They can not go to sea because we have no ships on which to send them. They are compelled, therefore, to do a distasteful duty, which they would willingly forego for the proud pleasure of commanding some great ship upon the high seas. These gallant fellows would gladly welcome some means which would place them in position to look forward to and win promotion.

Are we to let them remain idly on shore, or are we to encourage this patriotism, this energy, and this enterprise on their part? We do not want war; we want peace. But we want, in order to insure peace, to be ready for war. In doing this we follow the advice of Andrew Jackson, the advice of John Adams, and of every other man who has been signalized in the illustrious history of our country as a great statesman. Not one of those who occupied a great part in the formation of American history but has given this advice to our countrymen; and, Mr. Chairman, I should be sorry in this late day, in this the close of the nineteenth century, with the inspiring traditions of the past, with the hope of a glorious future before us, with ample material for military enterprises at our command, that we should be compelled to live under the stinging reproach which De Witt applied to the Dutch, that we were too stingy in time of peace to prepare for war!

We are charged with the duty of using every effort to perpetuate the Republic. We are responsible not only to those who send us here but to those who will come after us, to unborn generations, that we should at all times be prepared to meet any assault that may be made upon us from any country on the face of the earth.

I will admit that for a long time I was myself under the impression that this was an inopportune expenditure, and I say this now because I thoroughly sympathize with gentlemen who are interposing objections to this proposition. I am not criticising or finding fault in any way with them. I occupied the same position myself here at one time when the subject was first presented, and interposed objections to what I regarded as an expenditure that could be postponed. I saw that our ships were floating peacefully on the high seas; that our relations were amicable with all other nations; that there was no need for a navy to protect our commerce, and I saw no prospect for war.

But there is nothing so likely to happen in the history of a nation as war. It is the inevitable thing. Sooner or later it must come. There are no great nations of Quakers. The time has not come of which Tennyson sings—

The parliament of man, the confederation of the world.

We are not submitting our differences to the arbitration of peaceful commissions, and I hope we have not reached that depth of national degeneracy which would make our feeble Navy, in case of difficulties with other people, engage in what the French, during a disgraceful period of their naval history, called "engagements of circumspection."

We do not want a navy to go into battle with the commanding officer instructed to take care of the ships, not to get the paint knocked off, not to spend his ammunition, and to come out of the conflict with whole bones. We send a man in to sink and destroy the enemy, as Cushing took his life in his hand and went after the Albatross, as the gallant Japs went into Wei Hai Wei Harbor the other night and sunk the Chinese battle ships.

Speaking of torpedo boats, which my friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] thought to be the effective arm of warfare on the sea, every success of the torpedo boat has been in still water or in a harbor. At Wei Hai Wei, in the darkness of midnight, with the Chinese ships at anchor, with the water as smooth as a mirror, the Japanese torpedo boats came in silently along the shore, cutting every single line that led to torpedoes laid in the channels. Time and again they went, until all the lines leading to the sunken mines and torpedoes had been cut, and then they came to the attack and destroyed the fleet at anchor, which had been relying upon the defenses that had been taken away from them.

So in every other case where the torpedo has been effective the circumstances have been similar. In the Yalu River fight it cut no figure at all in the result. There was not a single torpedo that took effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes.

Mr. MONEY. I have no desire to occupy further time. I have talked for an hour, simply because I felt exceedingly interested in this subject; and if there is any objection to my going on I do not desire to. I ask leave that certain papers which I have here may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I feel, after the eloquent and thoughtful speech that we have just listened to from my friend from the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. MONEY], my honored associate in the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it is no easy task to reply to him or to anyone taking his side of this question.

I have never conquered the trepidation with which I arose the first time I addressed this House, and when I am to espouse a cause which is in many respects unpopular, which in many respects does not meet an echo in the hearts of my countrymen of any section, when I am to reply to such an admirable exposition of the cause of the increase of the Navy, I feel more than ordinarily doubtful of doing justice to myself or of impressing upon this House the views I would seek to.

I know how taking, how inspiring, how thrilling is the story of naval victories. I know how easy it is to make the cheeks glow and the eyes sparkle and the whole frame tingle by the story of naval prowess, from the time of Salamis to this very current year. I have done something in the way of reading and telling of those exploits to those who, I thought, would be excited over them. And if any of the gentlemen who favor the increase of the Navy would pay me enough for delivering a popular lecture on that subject, I think I could tell the story of naval prowess in ancient and in modern times, in foreign seas and in our own, in such a way that every boy in the United States would apply for a cadetship at Annapolis, if he had not applied for one already. [Laughter.]

But, sir, it is not the thrilling, it is not the inspiring, it is not the popular themes that it chiefly behoves a speaker here to address himself to. There is no difficulty in carrying away the American people by lofty sentiments. Sometimes we have to consider if there is not something else besides historic renown and what are considered lofty and elevating emotions.

I desire to ask the attention of the committee for a short time while I present what appear to me the objections to proposed increase of the battle ships of the American Navy, to some considerations founded on what may be deemed sordid and inferior grounds, and some considerations based, if I do not greatly mistake, on sentiments that are elevated even beyond martial renown, and have a power, if a man rightly receives them, to control him with a deeper emotion than even that of fighting for the honor of his country, elevated as that appears.

In the first place, sir, I wish the committee to consider this. The question is not whether we shall have a Navy, not whether we shall do something to arm ourselves for defence. It is whether this specific increase of three battle ships of the first class shall be provided for at the present time. It is whether, in addition to the four first-class battle ships now in process of construction, we shall go on and provide for a still greater increase. I am not aware that anybody has proposed to destroy the Navy of the United States. I think in a Democratic House, if one wanted to take that ground, it might be well to remind some gentlemen that Mr. Jefferson cut down the little old Navy which had been constructed by John Adams. But I am not aware that anybody proposes that.

The question is, if we shall go ahead. The question is, if we shall begin to put our Navy in competition with the navies of the greater powers of the world. If I understood my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] aright, that is the question before us. Now, sir, it will not be denied that it is a very expensive proposition. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] put it very well. The present Committee on Naval Affairs has very adroitly arranged this proposition so as to make it appear that the immediate expenditure is not to be serious. But we are going to lay the keel, if I may speak appropriately, for a considerable expenditure. We are going to discount the supposed surplus in the interest of an increasing Navy.

Now, sir, I am very willing to take the word, if you please, of the present Secretary of the Treasury that we are to have a surplus. I am willing and eager to believe that he tells the exact truth when he says that at the end of a specific time—at the end of this calendar year—he expects to see the revenue $21,000,000 ahead of the expenditures. I am willing to suppose he has underrated it. I am willing to suppose that it will be $25,000,000; but I would ask the gentleman, I would ask any member or members of the Committee on Appropriations, supposing we have that surplus, are there not drafts which are going to be made upon it to a degree that render indulgence in expensive luxuries a very serious and doubtful matter?

In the first place, I want to see our honest debts paid. I do not want to have claimants remain unpaid who have just claims on the Treasury of the United States, and whose claims have been allowed by the tribunal to which we refer those claims. I do not want successful pleaders before the Court of Claims to come in here year after year and session after session knocking at our doors and be told by the Committee on Appropriations that there is no money to pay claims that have in many instances been due for years, some for generations, and some for a century; that we are taking the money to build up a navy to protect our commerce and can not pay them for our commerce that was destroyed between 1798 and 1800 by the cruisers of the French Revolutionary navy, while the great-grandchildren of the men who lost those ships are here waiting for justice from the American Congress, and their claims are to be postponed until we have built some more ships with a possibility of having to protect our commerce in the future.

Then, sir, when we have paid all our just claims, when every claim that has been reported from the Court of Claims and from the Committee on Claims—and the chairman is before me—and from the Committee on War Claims (and of course they never report any but perfectly just claims which ought to be paid immediately), when all these debts have been paid, to come to the expenditures of home, to the expenditures that our citizens need to have made to keep them in peace and prosperity—I think, sir, for instance, the first thing that comes into my mind is the grossly inadequate salaries that are paid the higher officials. The gentleman from Mississippi wants us to compete with foreign nations. He wants us to expend money on our Navy and our national defense on a scale worthy of the greatest and richest nation on the earth and something like what is expended by Great Britain, by France, by the German Empire, and by Austria-Hungary.

Does he think of what an unworthy spectacle our foreign ministers present when they go to reside in those countries? Does he consider what grossly inadequate salaries are received by our public men, by our Cabinet officers, by our judges, so that you can hardly get a first-rate lawyer to take a judicial place on account of the miserable pittance that our judges receive? I think of our post-office, I think of how the Government of Great Britain carries his letters and his parcels to every man's door, and I think how far behind we are in that respect with all our boasted progress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that we are unable to get first-rate lawyers to take judicial positions?

Mr. EVERETT. That is my idea.

Mr. DINGLEY. So far as I have heard in this House and elsewhere, there has been no difficulty in getting first-rate lawyers to accept judicial positions when tendered to them. [Laughter.]

Mr. EVERETT. Well, I would say to the gentleman from Maine that I constantly hear the exact opposite from members of the bar.

Mr. DINGLEY. That must be a mistake, judging from what I have seen and heard here.

Mr. EVERETT. Well, I hear one way and the gentleman from Maine hears another way.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. The gentleman is not responsible for what he hears.

Mr. EVERETT. Neither am I.

Mr. HULICK. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that after the 4th of March there will be many good lawyers out of business. [Laughter.]

Mr. EVERETT. Does the gentleman from Ohio think that our judicial salaries are adequate? Mr. Chairman, I think of the things I have mentioned, and further, I would raise the question which is familiar to all gentlemen here, of the state of our public buildings throughout the country. I would raise the question which constantly comes up before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the question of the need, the absolute need, of what some people absurdly speak of as "steals," the absolute need of erecting at proper points all over the country public buildings suited to the requirements of a people like ours.

Why, sir, I took pleasure the other day in voting for a new post-office at Chicago. I voted for a building there that was estimated to cost $4,000,000. I was ready to speak for that bill, but Chicago never needs anyone to speak for her or in praise of her; she is always able to blow her own trumpet just as loud as there is need of at any given time. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I felt that that was a great public necessity. I feel now that if we are to have a surplus that is the kind of object that our money should be spent for. Do you tell me that that building was for the city of Chicago alone? Not a bit of it!

Every city in the country, every village in the country, from Houlton down to Galveston and off to Tacoma in the West, is interested in having the letters go through the Chicago post-office safely and speedily. Chicago is one of the great central organs of the entire country. I do not know that I can call it the heart or the head or the stomach of the country; but I may be entitled to call Chicago the liver of the country, through which there passes a great circulation which converts all the things we swallow into sugar for the benefit of the body politic. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I say that for all these needs and for other needs the surplus, if there is one, would be discounted over and over again. Think of the Indians. Think of what they call for. The starving Navajoes called for $25,000 the other day and there was a doubt as to whether it should be given to them; and yet we have money to build war ships! Think of the District of Columbia, with its overcrowded schoolhouses, the children absolutely deprived of school facilities by reason of our close economy. I think this naval appropriation bill proposes to make appropriations above the estimates, while, if I am not mistaken, every other appropriation bill, except the agricultural bill, goes under the estimates. When you have raised those other bills to the level of the estimates of the Cabinet officers and Departments, then we can see about discounting the surplus on any one bill and going beyond or above the estimates.

Now, sir, if we mean anything by economy this is the place to practise it; and let me say just here that I give my Republican friends as much credit for wishing real economy as I do my Democratic friends. I do not believe there is any man here who will vote for an expenditure that he has not some good reason for voting for, and I believe that generous and liberal expenditure as well as economy is a right principle upon which the representatives of a great nation ought to act. [Applause.] But why do I name these appropriations and these claims as being more deserving than that of the battle ships? Why do I think that the full recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Interior should be carried out in the appropriation bills rather than those of the Secretary of the Navy?

I will try to say, Mr. Chairman, and herein I know that I am going to trench upon somewhat delicate ground; I know that in what I am about to say now I take some risk of touching the feeling of some of my friends on both sides of the House, and I entreat every gentleman who hears me, I entreat all those who love their country, to believe that in what I am going to say I am actuated by as keen patriotism and as high appreciation of personal distinction as any gentleman that sits before me here.

There is nothing, Mr. Chairman, by which you can arouse men to excitement more easily than by words of "military glory" and "fighting for the renown of the flag." I see on each side of me men of whose personal acquaintance I am proud, whom I feel honored by knowing, men who have distinguished themselves in war on land and sea. I see men before me and around me who have proved in the strongest way in which men can prove it that they are afraid of no exposure, of no danger, of no suffering—who, if God so willed, would have met death itself for the honor, as they believed, of their country, and the flag, and the truth.

I know that in every generation of the world there have been brave men who have been ready to fight and suffer and die for their country. And I know how that thought makes men excited and emulous so that they believe there is nothing greater in the world than a war in behalf of what is esteemed a just cause. That has been the way in times past; it is to a great extent the way in the present. But here I stand to say, if I am the only man on the floor to say it—here I say, if I knew it would make me distrusted and laughed at in the House; here I say, if I knew that every man, woman, and child in my own old State, the State of naval glory, would be against me—there is something greater than renown in war; there is something better than dying for your country, and that is living for it. [Applause.]

It belongs to the past, it belongs to barbarous ages, it belongs to a bygone and effete civilization, it belongs to the system of Europe, it does not belong to us to look forward and contemplate and reason and count the chances of war. We hear those terrible words—"in case of war"—"in the event of war." The report of the gallant Secretary of the Navy, the report of my gallant friends, both the majority and the minority of the Naval Committee—their reports and recommendations ring with such words. It is that old war fever. It is allowing one's self to contemplate the possibility, the danger, and the horror of having to fight for your country. O, yes, we can fight for it—no men better in the world. I know it. We have proved it; and we need not prove it again. But we have a better destiny before us.

Allow the European nations to make their great war preparations. Allow Italy to plunge herself into bankruptcy with her Triple Alliance. Allow Russia to raise loan after loan from an impoverished people. Allow the spirit of Bismarck and Von Moltke still to dominate in Prussia. Allow England to pile up her forty-three war ships. Allow France to nourish the temper of Boulanger in her bosom. But not for the United States are such things. O, no! We can settle our differences otherwise. We can withhold all unjust claims. We can put ourselves in such a position with other nations that we need not increase our Navy.

We have a Navy. I do not seek to destroy it. Keep it and man it. Possibly in times when we have a surplus—an undoubted surplus, a big surplus [laughter]—possibly at a time when we need not be raising gold loans at 4 per cent or even at 3½ per cent—possibly at a time when all is peaceful and easy in our cities, we may then amuse ourselves with building more battle ships as pretty but expensive toys. But when we are taken out of the war system of European nations; when we have entered upon the new and glorious destiny of the future; when we have put behind us all this ancient history; when the course of our peaceful empire is taking its way westward, do not let us turn our eyes backward; do not let us be conjuring up old needless fears.

I see before me, as I say, men who have fought bravely and have learned each other's prowess. I would appeal to the old soldiers here, if there is any greater horror than war; if there is anything that kills off what a nation would sooner keep and save, is it not war?

O, Mr. Chairman, I know how I shall be answered. I can tell almost in advance the number of eloquent men, the number of witty men, the number of popular men here who can rise, if they will, when I get through, and can pour upon me, if they choose, charges of not maintaining the honor of "the old flag." "The old flag" will maintain its own honor. "The old flag" never can be disgraced and never can be humiliated. The nations of the world are not in danger of insulting it simply because we have declined to put three new battle ships on our list of the Navy.

Yes, there is a foreign enemy. There is an enemy lying in wait for us that is not American. But that enemy is not in Great Britain or France; it is not in Austria or Chili. That enemy, that foreign enemy, that un-American enemy is in our great cities. The foreign enemy that we have to dread is planted in the streets of our great cities—your city and mine. There it is festering; there it is seething; there it is threatening destruction to American institutions far greater and more speedy than any thunders that the Majestic could hurl against us when she shall make her trial trip next August. There is the problem for us. There is what demands the expenditure of our surplus. There is where we have to work in order to bring about prosperity in our country. We have got to train, to educate, to guard, to raise, to assimilate that population in our great cities, and it is from them and not from the enemy outside of our borders that we have anything to fear.

When I was a boy, Mr. Chairman, I was eager as any boy could be to read of wars and of military glory. There was no boy in the schools of Cambridge or Boston that could be stirred to excitement sooner than I by reading the history of some mighty victory from Marathon to Waterloo. At that time, when but ten years old, and with a mind stored more than most of boys of that age, as I read those exciting and inspiring stories I read also the lines written by one of our own poets, which I thought then were false; lines that, as boys will do, feeling as I did towards them, I marked with pencil in my Reader as worthy of reprobation and condemnation, for I thought them silly; but I know now they are true. I know now that those words of the poet Longfellow, describing the arsenal at Springfield—calling on every nation to stop in its career of piling up armaments, to stop its miserable game of "Beggars my Neighbor" to see which nation should frighten the other the most—I know that those words are true.

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts.

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred,
And every nation that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear for evermore the curse of Cain.

You say let them begin first. You say we can not disarm until they do. I say yes! We can. I say it is with us to lead the van. It is with us to begin; it is with us to announce to the nations of the world, that are still quivering under the reign of the effete notions of antiquity, "here we stand in our ancient renown, that needs no vindication; in our justice, in our moderation, prepared to submit to peaceable arbitration every question between ourselves and our brethren, and you may go on in your game of war—you may go on and construct your ironclads, increase your artillery and infantry and musketry—the United States is too great, too noble, too modern to sink herself to the level of the military nations of the ancient world." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman who has just addressed the House [Dr. EVERETT] rises with great trepidation to speak on this question, anyone who follows him, and especially who follows him on the opposite side of the question he advocates, may certainly rise with no small degree of trepidation as well. For, being no orator, nor the son of any distinguished orator (and the gentleman from Massachusetts is both), I esteem it a great privilege to say something here to-day in support of the bill which the Naval Committee of this House has brought before us, and especially with reference to that portion of it which provides for the construction of three additional battle ships.

Mr. Chairman, I will go as far as any man on this floor in favor of peace. I have as earnest a desire as any man that peace should continue to dwell with the people of the United States. But the history of all the world, both ancient and modern, shows us that we can not always count on peace, and that the attitude and conduct of affairs of one nation always have more or less effect upon the attitude and conduct of others.

I will go as far as the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of the discharge on the part of this nation of every one of its obligations, and especially those the gentleman himself so eloquently advocated, the payment of which have been adjudicated in the courts and whose history is well known to the country. I mean, of course, the French spoliation claims, which France paid to our Government nearly a century ago, when we purchased Louisiana. But the history of this House shows that the men who are loudest in their arguments in favor of economy, who are the strongest opponents of any measure having a tendency toward building up the Navy, improving rivers and harbors, or expenditures in any other direction, are the men who are invariably found voting against the payment of these claims to which the gentleman so eloquently refers, even when they have merged in judgments in favor of the claimants. And from this list I desire to except my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT], whose voice has always been raised, whose vote has always been given, in maintenance of the honor of the country and in favor of discharging the obligations which should be paid.

I want to say to my friends upon this side of the House that I think we have dwelt too much upon what are called ideas of economy. I believe in the nation paying all its debts, in meeting all its obligations, in making provisions in time of peace for a war that may occur, and I beg of you to remember the great history of the Democracy in this country, the great areas of territory that were acquired under Democratic administrations, and that in fact nearly all of our territorial extensions have been so acquired.

There is no interest to-day which should more seriously engage the attention of the American people than the maintenance and the upbuilding of an American navy.

Our future growth lies in the success of our commerce, and no great commerce has ever been built up without the assistance of a navy to protect the merchant marine and enforce the rights of merchants and traders. I want to see such a condition of affairs, such a number of vessels constructed, that wherever the American citizen or the American merchant may go on the face of the earth, either in savage or civilized lands, there will be felt the power of the United States, with the ability to maintain the rights of its citizens, and the interests of its commerce, wherever they may be in danger.

All history shows that the one goes with the other. In every nation in Europe—and we may for many years to come get many lessons in experience from that part of the world—when that great war-genius of the nineteenth century, Napoleon, had changed the map of Europe to his liking, when it seemed as though every nation was his vassal, the one power that stood out against him, the one power about which coalesced the great allies that in the end secured his downfall, was England the great naval power of the world. His defeat began at the battle of Trafalgar. Powerful as he was on the land he was never as powerful upon the sea, and the element of permanent supremacy in commerce went then and will go in the future to the country which maintains its supremacy on the sea.

Gentlemen have talked about the decay of American shipping. It is not necessarily the result of the reasons they give. In the era of wooden vessels American wooden vessels carried the commerce of this nation, and were the most successful in the world. When the era of iron vessels came American shipping declined, and has declined from that day to this, and until we can build ships as cheaply as our neighbors can they necessarily will be the builders and sellers of ships in the markets of the world.

Let me refer here for a moment to what was urged by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] this morning in reference to the article in the North American Review for November, 1894, written by the Secretary of the Navy. If gentlemen will read the article they will find that the portion which he read was simply a statement of the impression to be derived from the accounts in the newspapers as to the result of the battle in the Yalu River, and not what were the actual facts or the Secretary's opinion thereon, and that article is in direct line with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy in his annual report and in the committee's report in support of this bill, and the argument of the article is that we ought to construct these battle ships.

The Secretary says (page 515, volume 159, North American Review):

The only purpose of this paper is to contend that what seems to be a largely prevailing present impression is not justified by any information now at hand. * * * for it is believed to be in the highest degree improbable that anything ever can be learned from Yalu that will put an end to the building of heavily armored vessels.

There was no first battle ship there [at Yalu]. If there was not, as will hereafter be shown, it is not easy to see how anything can possibly come out of that fight to distort the general conclusions embodied in such a vessel by the common consent of naval experts after so much and such prolonged study and experiment.

But they tell us, too, that these battle ships can not enter the harbors of our country. It is not so necessary that they should enter particular harbors along the great line of the seacoast of this country as it is that they should be so constructed and managed that they would prevent a foreign enemy from entering those harbors, and that the cities of Portland, Portsmouth, Boston, Newport, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, San Francisco, Galveston, and all the other important cities upon the great line of coast shall in any emergency and under all circumstances have a reasonable guaranty that they will be free from either contribution, attack, or destruction at the hands of a foreign enemy.

And not only are these particular cities interested in the maintenance of the American Navy, but every interior town or city, or the land remote from the coast, is interested just as well, for you can not strike down or paralyze the seaports of a state or of a country without paralyzing directly to the same extent the business of the country of which that city is the metropolis.

However desirable it may be to indulge in dreams of the universal reign of peace and of what men ought to be, legislators must deal with them and with nations as they actually are. They must deal with events as they are expected to happen in the ordinary course of human affairs.

I do not share in any of the distrust that we are not able now, or shall not be able in the future, financially or otherwise, to meet every obligation which shall come upon us. But these obligations must be discharged one with another. And while I am willing that we should pay all the legitimate and proper expenses of the Government, I am also willing, and I think it is our duty, to provide, as the committee have done in this bill, for the commencement of these three additional battle ships, which, with the four already under construction—the Iowa, Indiana, Oregon, and Massachusetts—will be something like what this great nation should have as a proper naval armament.

It is not intended, nor, I take it, contemplated, that these battle ships should make long voyages. While they should be thoroughly seagoing, they are intended and should be intended for the coast defense of the country. They might defend Baltimore to-day, and Washington or Portland or some other place to-morrow, and we shall have all the advantages of that coast defense which Samuel J. Tilden so strenuously advocated prompt and liberal appropriations for and at the same time have the advantage of having them from time to time at that place where they are most needed. No one will contend that the cruisers of the United States are in excess of the actual requirements of this country to-day.

By the construction of these battle ships, which should be maintained nearer home, we shall have more of these cruisers available for the purpose of sending them to different portions of the world where they may be needed; for it is not reasonable to contemplate that in case the cruisers should be needed at any place that we should be compelled to wait until they could be sent from this country, even in the rapid manner in which ships are moved from one place to another now.

Gentlemen speak of the long distance of Europe and of Asia from this country. They should remember that the distance formerly measured by months is now measured by weeks and days, and what was measured by weeks or days is now measured by hours; and that by aid of the telegraph commands are flashed from one continent to another around the world. They should remember that the method of meeting and dealing with great questions that may arise, and do arise, has been very much changed in the way of transacting the business of the country. They tell us that the battle ship you build to-day may not be fit for use in a year.

They tell us that the improvements in ordnance have more than kept in advance of the improvements in the construction of battle ships. That may be true; and yet it is true of everything that is done in mechanics to-day; for that which seems to be the most useful and perfect invention to-day by some superior invention may become comparatively useless to-morrow. But we can not cease to make use of these conveniences. That is one of the reasons we must necessarily build battle ships. They tell us that it takes about four years to construct a battle ship, and we shall have all the benefits from time to time of any changes that may be advisable or necessary, of any changes that may be made, and of any advance that may be made in the construction of these vessels; and therefore we need not necessarily be alarmed about the matter.

This is a question more important than a few million dollars. It is more important than a question of mere economy. It is above and beyond all that. It should be the duty, and I think it is the pride and wish of every citizen of this country who loves his country and wishes to maintain its integrity and prosperity to pay whatever taxes are necessary in order to maintain the American Navy in that condition which the best interests of this country demand.

I am glad to say that during my term of service in this House my vote has always been given for the advancement and improvement of that arm of the service. I have not always had as many with me upon my side of the House as I could wish upon this question; but here is something that we can all unite upon. It is not a question that concerns one side more than the other, but we meet on the broad plane of American citizenship and should join hands in favor of that policy which will best upbuild this country. I do not think it is a bad thing in the human heart to emulate virtue and heroism, whether displayed on the deck of a ship or the field of battle, on the land or the sea, at the engine's throttle, in the rescuing lifeboat, or wherever the ability and the heroism of man may be exercised for humanity and the best interests of his country.

The people whom I represent live remote from the ocean borders of this country, in the region of the Great Lakes, comparatively inaccessible to foreign fleets, but I would like to see stationed at the mouth of the St. Lawrence River a battle ship which would tend to maintain the security of those people from any aggressions from that direction, and I would like to see a ship canal in our own territory from the Lakes to the sea so ably advocated long ago by that distinguished Democrat, Albert Gallatin. I would be glad to see exactly similar protection around the coast of the United States from Portland, Me., to Alaska. I would like to see every citizen of the American Republic at all times willing to stand by that policy which was calculated for the best interests of all the American people. Nothing can be done to one portion of this country to its injury without injuring to some extent all of this country. We stand or fall together.

This is not a question of localities. It is not a question of personal or local advantage for this or for that person or place; and while it is not, perhaps, one of the highest arguments advanced for the construction of these battle ships that the work would afford employment to a large number of men and to a large established industry at the same time, that is no reason, to my mind, why I should not vote for the recommendations of this committee. With these ideas, so imperfectly expressed, in my limited time, in favor of taking that action which shall best advance the interests of my country, in pursuance of my idea that it is the duty of every good citizen to stand by and support that policy which shall uphold the honor and dignity of the United States, and in discharge of my duty as a Representative here, representing people who are willing and desirous to maintain a Navy suitable to the needs of this great country, and thereby to advance the commerce and all the best interests of the whole country, I shall vote for this bill, and I heartily hope that every member of the House will do the same. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the indulgence of the Committee of the House while I speak to the question of the growth and increase of the American Navy. The question is one of the highest importance. It addresses itself to us not as partisans but as patriots. In any well-considered step to carry out this policy of the maintenance and increase of our sea power and of provision for permanent and efficient navy-yards adapted to create ordnance and ships, the encouragement of plants and establishments capable of the speedy production of armor and all that goes to create or repair a vessel of war, or to put on the best possible footing the personnel of the Navy, both officers and men, we will only respond to the ardent aspirations of the American people.

They are wise enough to see their interest in this business. They are thoroughly in accord with the general policy of Secretary Tracy and Secretary Herbert, who have so strongly and ably urged and pushed forward the improvement and development of the Navy. No question can be suggested on which the American people are more united and emphatic than this. The time has gone by when the voice of factions or party spirit could venture to cavil at a liberal policy of encouragement to this arm of our national defense.

It is not a question between those who reside in the interior or on the exposed seaboard; for all alike recognize the necessity of an effective navy, and the people of the interior are as proud and sensitive on questions of national honor and defense as those of the Eastern or the Pacific Coast. Even those who earnestly desire a policy of peace can not be blind enough to imagine that an inefficient navy is anything else than an invitation to aggression, or to doubt, on the other hand, that an adequate preparation to defend our rights is the surest method to prevent those infringements upon them which would necessitate war, with all its cost of suffering and expense.

AMERICAN NAVAL HISTORY.

A taste for maritime adventure and a capacity for naval operations have characterized American character and illustrated almost every epoch of our history, beginning even in the earliest colonial period. It mattered not that a virgin continent, with its latent wealth, lay before them to be subdued; that herein was presented an ample field for all the energies of an active and heroic race, or that the mother country, with abundant capital and equal maritime instincts of adventure, stood ready to supply this theater of man's effort; still there was something in the long line of our seacoast and bays and streams and in the surroundings of its settlement, and in inherited traditions and instincts, that made Americans in the very earliest period ready and eager for maritime adventure. This appeared early in the seventeenth century. The American whale fishery and other commerce involving risk and heroism began at a very early period. In 1707, 1709, and 1710 we find no less than three naval expeditions against Port Royal, in Acadia, organized by the colonists, the last of which was successful. In the French war of 1744 we find a large land and naval force set on foot by the eastern colonies to act in conjunction with the British fleet against Louisburg. The spirit of naval daring existed from the outset.

Coming down to the period of the Revolutionary war, we are amazed at the energy and audacity of the Colonies in continuous maritime warfare against their enemies. They had a population of less than three millions, scanty pecuniary resources, no allies at the outset of the struggle, and no dockyards or facilities for building large vessels of war, and they had to confront the greatest maritime nation in the world, whose fleets darkened our shores; but the spirit of the people rose to the occasion. Numerous vessels of war were bought, or built, or captured, and under commissions, sometimes from Congress and very often as privateers, went boldly forth to battle. Even the coast and waters of Great Britain were not safe from their incursions. An American ship commanded by Paul Jones captured a British frigate in British waters after a fight of three hours and a half. This was only one of many incidents of valor, enterprise, and endurance by our naval heroes against extraordinary odds in that war.

The exhaustion of a seven years' struggle and the lack of a national government delayed for years the formation of a permanent navy, but this great work was begun during the Administration of President Washington. In his annual message of December 7, 1796, he earnestly impressed this subject upon the attention of Congress. He said:

To an active external commerce the protection of a naval force is indispensable. But, besides this, it is our own experience that the most sincere neutrality is not a sufficient guard against the depredations of nations at war. To secure respect to a neutral flag requires a naval force, organized and ready to vindicate it from insult or aggression. This may even prevent the necessity of going to war, by discouraging belligerent powers from committing such violations of the rights of the neutral party as may, first or last, leave no other option.

Will it not, then, be advisable to begin without delay to provide and lay up the materials for the building and equipping of ships of war, and to proceed in the work by degrees, in proportion as our resources shall render it practicable without inconvenience, so that a future war of Europe may not find our commerce in the same unprotected state in which it was found by the present.

Such was the wise advice of Washington. It was not long before it was followed by the building of a navy which was developed from year to year. The regrettable difficulties in 1798 with France, our old and honored ally, to whom we owe so much, soon showed the necessity of this wise precaution. With the very first year of this century it became necessary to send a large portion of our infant Navy to the Mediterranean Sea in order to chastise the Barbary powers for their piratical assaults upon American commerce. These operations were serious and hazardous, but they were successful, and served to illustrate and develop the courage and skill of our officers and seamen. The value of this schooling was felt when the arrogance and injustice of Great Britain forced us into the war of 1812. The naval performances of that period were so brilliant, effective, and important that they are now known of all men. The names of Hull, Stewart, Bainbridge, Lawrence, Rogers, and Porter are familiar to every schoolboy in the land. From that day the position of the United States Navy became fixed in American policy and in the hearts of the people.

The Navy became a matter of pride to us all, and though it was not our fortune for long years to be involved in a war with a great naval power, and though our general policy was one of peace, yet it was deemed a wise policy to maintain our naval establishment. Up to the time of the civil war the ships and personnel of the American Navy could well be compared with those of other nations. There was an era of comparative peace, but the Japan expedition opened up that interesting country to commerce, civilization, and a wonderful progress; another expedition under Wilkes explored the South Seas, the deep-sea sounding of Brooke paved the way to the Atlantic cable, and the genius of Matthew Maury studied and mapped the winds and currents of the ocean so that its great pathways might be traversed by mariners with precision and certainty.

As one of those who participated in the great struggle between the States I can bear witness to the skill and courage of officers and seamen of the United States and to the achievements which demonstrated their ability to encounter a great naval power. No such foe then confronted them on the sea; for the Confederacy had no fleets and only a few cruisers, but there was much important work to be performed by a navy. The maintenance of a systematic blockade of the Southern coast contributed more than any one cause to the final success of the Union arms. On the other hand, the Americans composing the small Confederate navy, though lacking shipyards and naval resources, and embarrassed by the deficiencies in the arts and appliances of naval construction, displayed the highest courage and aptitude for this service. A most striking illustration of this capacity and resource may be found in the construction, by Captain Brooke, of Virginia, amid every difficulty and impediment from scanty means and material, of an ironclad vessel of war in the early part of the year 1862—the famous Merrimac—which by its success against the Congress and the Cumberland may be said to have revolutionized the naval shipbuilding of the world.

It is true that the idea of an ironclad vessel for harbor defense had been suggested by Stevens, an American citizen, long before, in 1842, and that some ironclads had been built by France and England prior to the civil war of 1861, but the first practical demonstration of the immense superiority of the ironclad to the wooden frigate or war vessel was in the naval combat of 1862 at Hampton Roads. From that hour the nations of Europe began as rapidly as possible to substitute the iron or armor-clad war vessel propelled by steam for the old wooden battle ship. Nations even of the second or third rank in power quickly followed this example, but it was long years before the United States fairly accepted and acted upon the lesson first impressively taught by Americans in American waters. Other nations had left us far behind while we were still repairing and reconstructing our old wooden fleet. But the hour of awakening came at last when the country, with almost one voice, demanded the reconstruction of the American Navy upon the lines of modern science and development, aided by the lights of modern warfare and by the skill of our best educated thought. The people demanded a new Navy, and Congress responded to the demand with appropriations which at first small and tentative, soon became liberal, and in some degree worthy of a great power.

In 1876 the highest official authority in the service stated that "there was no navy in the world that was not in advance of us with regard to ships and guns;" and in his annual report of November 30, 1885, Secretary Whitney stated to the President that "it was questionable whether the country had a single naval vessel finished and afloat at the present time (1885) that could be trusted to encounter the ships of any important power."

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE NAVY.

This great work, however, was begun by Congress during the administration of Secretary Chandler. From 1881 to 1885 5 cruisers and 3 gunboats, with a total tonnage of 23,076, were authorized, and work begun on new vessels amounting to 12,363 tons. Still greater progress was made from 1885 to 1889, under the administration of Secretary Whitney. There were authorized 2 battle ships of the second class, 1 armored cruiser, 1 armored harbor-defense ship, 9 cruisers, 4 gunboats, 1 practice vessel, 1 ram, 1 dynamite-gun vessel, 1 torpedo boat, and 3 tugs, the whole aggregating 67,183 tons. From 1889 to 1893, under Secretary Tracy, there were authorized 4 first-class battle ships, 1 armored cruiser, 2 protected cruisers of extreme speed, 1 torpedo cruiser, and 1 torpedo boat, with a total tonnage of 66,616. Such is the satisfactory showing, as respects authorizations of ships, contained in the last report of Secretary Tracy. The same report exhibits the most important results in the developments of armor, torpedoes, heavy rapid-fire guns, armor-piercing shells, smokeless powder, high explosives—for all of which it is essential that we should depend on ourselves and not a foreign nation. [Applause.]

The progress made in the character of our ships built or in process of construction and in ordnance has brought us abreast in these respects with the nations which have so long led the van in these modern improvements. But, sir, there is a great difference between the authorization and commencement of a new and untried work, involving the highest science and mechanical skill, and actually accomplished results. The able report of the present Secretary, made November, 1893, informs us of the delays and the causes of delay in our naval construction, and while he says that "We find much to be proud of in the knowledge that we can now furnish the material for and build ships of war as quickly and without any doubt as well as any country in the world," there is in the same report affable showing that twelve of the most valuable ships then authorized were still in process of construction, including the heavy line-of-battle ships, and that some of these vessels would not be completed before 1895 and 1896. A comparison of our Navy with those of other nations showed that the United States ranked only seventh as a naval power. We have more cause to be gratified at what we know we can do than by what is actually accomplished by us in respect to naval armament.

SEA-POWER ESSENTIAL TO NATIONAL GREATNESS.

Sir, I trust it is needless for me to enlarge upon the value and importance of sea power. No nation can be great or complete without it. It was sea power that gave preeminence to Athens, Carthage, and Rome in ancient days. The lack of it, as compared with England, enfeebled and limited the energies of France in her long struggle with Great Britain from 1793 to 1814, and not even the genius of Napoleon was able to surmount the difficulties growing out of the immense superiority of England on the sea. The victory of Trafalgar over the fleets of France and Spain fully balanced that of Austerlitz and left England free to exert her arms, money, and vast resources with the certainty that her own soil and industries would be absolutely secure against interruption or devastation. Our success over Mexico from 1846 to 1848 was mainly dependent upon our command of the sea to transport armies and their supplies. Even in this hour of peace we find a continual demand for the services of our small Navy.

In the report alluded to Secretary Herbert rightly advises us that revolutionary troubles have imperiled American commerce in Peru, Nicaragua on its east and west coasts, Honduras, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Argentina, and Brazil. We need a number of vessels to patrol the Bering Sea. We need a home squadron on both the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. It is only a few months since it became necessary to bring vessels around Cape Horn from the Pacific to protect our commerce in the waters of Brazil, and but a few months earlier than this, during Mr. Harrison's Administration, we were on the verge of a war with Chile, a country possessing some 18 war vessels and 21 torpedo boats, a force which, considering her limited population and wealth, teaches us an impressive and much-needed lesson. Then, sir, we have an existing war—sprung upon the civilized world with no formal declaration of hostilities and hardly a note of warning—between China and Japan—a war liable at any moment to put in jeopardy the property and the lives of our citizens and the large commerce we have with both these nations.

To concentrate promptly an adequate force in these Asiatic waters, without stripping other important points of duty and activity, might well task the energies of the Executive. Vessels of war have been sent there which will doubtless be used as efficiently as possible; but that there are enough of them adapted to all the emergencies that may be required is a very serious question indeed.

But I pass from the governments of South America and the Asiatic populations, whose tumultuous passions and excitability during a war of invasion are far more to be dreaded than the good faith of their rulers.

We are at peace now with the European powers and we desire to remain so. It is not so very long since we had a serious issue with Spain, and there is yet another Government, a great naval power, with which we have had already two long and severe wars, and many dangerous international questions involving our rights and honor, and whose recognition of our just rights as a nation will be in exact proportion to our disposition and ability to defend these rights both by sea and by land. If we are to rely on England's magnanimity alone in our differences with her, we shall lean on a broken reed. The true line of policy for us to adopt is that embodied in the well-considered utterances of the present head of the Navy Department. In a former report he says:

It seems certain, therefore, that the future is to bring with it an increase of international questions, to a settlement of which in a manner which will be at once peaceful and honorable naval strength will be absolutely essential. We must make and keep our Navy in such a condition of efficiency as to give weight and power to whatever policy it may be thought wise on the part of our Government to assume. The Navy is to maintain an honorable peace, begotten by an assured strength to protect rights, enforce just claims, beget security against foreign aggression, and compel respect for any policy of our people which may affect foreign nations.

Sir, this country is able to create and maintain a navy. It is second to no country in the world in wealth; it is equaled only by Russia of the civilized nations in population, and its resources and capacity to be a leading naval power are much superior to those of any country in the world. If we prefer to occupy a subordinate and a helpless position as the seventh naval power in the world it is our own choice and our own folly and shame. To be among the very first is our natural position, and we ought to occupy it. [Applause.]

Holding these opinions, as I have done consistently for a long time, I am deeply gratified to find that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended to us to authorize the construction of 3 battle ships of about 10,000 tons displacement each, to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $4,000,000 each, and 12 torpedo boats of from 100 to 300 tons each, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, to cost not exceeding an average of $170,000.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN NAVIES COMPARED.

Sir, there is a good deal of misapprehension in respect to our existing naval strength. In popular estimation it is most grossly exaggerated. It is a fleet that could easily have destroyed all the ships that fought at Trafalgar or the Nile, but how would it compare in strength with even a section of the present navies of England, France, Germany, or Russia?

We have four fine battle ships now building, and to be completed in a few months more. England has already 43 battle ships, France 18, Germany 13, Italy 9, and Russia 8. In process of construction England has 10, France 12, Italy 9, and Russia 9.

We have two battle ships of the second class in process of construction.

Let us look at the additions England and France are making to their armament. England has about completed some 70 war ships that were authorized five years ago. Does she stop there? Not at all. She has just authorized a new programme of construction of 100 vessels, including 10 first-class battle ships, 6 battle ships of the second class, 33 cruisers, some smaller vessels, and a large number of torpedo boats.

Some three years ago France adopted a programme which called for a total of 81 vessels, of which 10 were to be armored, 50 to be cruisers, and 21 to be torpedo vessels, and smaller vessels.

With such activity as this we do not propose to compete, but in comparison with this exhibition of force and energy by these four nations, England, France, Germany, and Italy, how small and reasonable appears the recommendation of our Secretary, which, if adopted, would only add three battle ships to the four we have now in process of construction.

Take again the torpedo boats. We have provided for three or four in all up to this time. England has 175; France, 217; Germany, 119; Italy, 178; Russia, 163; Argentina, 22; Chile, 22; Japan, 26; Austria, 64, and Brazil, 22.

England is building 64, France 42, Spain 25, and Japan 23 torpedo boats.

The Secretary has asked us for authority to build twelve torpedo boats at a cost of about $2,000,000 for the whole. This would give us sixteen torpedo boats in all—a small force indeed, considering the extent of our coast, the demands of our commerce, and the amount of this force possessed not only by first-class powers but by nations usually considered weak and feeble powers, like Turkey, Argentina, Chile, and Brazil. If our battle-ships are not able to meet those of a strong naval power we ought at least to be able to defend our ports from attack. The head of the Navy Department tells us that—

For the defense of ports torpedo boats are more effective according to cost than any other class of vessels. The knowledge of their existence alone will make an enemy chary about approaching within bombarding distance.

A FOOL'S PARADISE.

There is a policy cherished by some persons which I can only denominate as "living in a fool's paradise." It assumes that all will go well. The world is great and all we have to do is to get in our shell—nobody will then trouble us. We may have a vast empire, a great population, a great destiny, manifold interests, but we are to depend on the forbearance of all the powers, big and little, on the face of the globe. Ships cost money, and money must not be spent save for something that will bring votes. If it will do that we need not stop at twenty, fifty, or a hundred million dollars.

Concede, if you please, that war may come and that for lack of preparation we may be disgracefully thrashed. That is nothing. We can go to work and build ships in numbers and have our revenge. It will take a very short time to do all this and our enemies will meantime allow us to build our warships without let or hindrance. We must not have an efficient Navy. If we build one our naval officers will be spoiling for a fight and want to annex some outlying islands or provinces.

Such is the idea and the talk of some who are hardly ready to avow it publicly. I wish gentlemen to take heed to it that the American people are not willing to exist with all their rights and dignity as a nation upon the mere sufferance of foreign powers. Let them remember how different our position is from that of the European nations. In a naval war England may probably count on the alliance of Germany and Italy to supplement and reinforce her own fleets. France may rely on Russia, and Russia in turn on France. Hardly one of these European Governments is outside of an alliance in case of war, but if we have conflict we have no bond that assures us of an ally to help us out. Indeed, if we were to propose such an alliance to any power we might be exposed to the humiliating question, "What can you do to help us in return for what we do for you?"

But there is another most important consideration which is pointed out to us in the report of the Secretary. We are about reaching a point when if we stop constructing ships the extensive plants and workshops for armor, war ships, and the like will be abandoned and go to waste, and the present well-organized and skilled body of mechanics and laborers will be dispersed, many of them perhaps going to foreign countries for their employment at the hands of Governments more sagacious than ours in providing for the maintenance of national rights and honor. If this be done, and the time shall come when an indignant public sentiment shall force additions to the Navy, we shall have to wait years before we can reinstate ourselves where we stand to-day. Our present standpoint is one of great advantage for naval construction, the result of long and patient effort, study, and skill. A battle ship or an armored cruiser is not built in a day any more than Rome was built in a day.

Sir, it would be the height of folly to throw away our present power and capacities for building and equipping vessels of war. It is our duty to give the additions the Department asks us to give, and to add also the 2,088 men essential to man the vessels already built. I admit the present deficiencies of the revenue, but these will be supplied, and as the appropriation for the increase contemplated will be carried through a series of years, the amount to be paid in the next year will not be large enough to create any trouble in raising the money needed. If we do this we will have done a good work and the people will applaud our action. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

JAMES JONES.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 8811, which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Jones, a soldier of the war of 1836, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a joint resolution (H. Res. 273) extending from March 1, 1895, to the 15th day of April, 1895, the time for making returns of income for the year 1894, with amendments of the Senate thereto, on which a conference was requested.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two houses.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. McMILLIN, Mr. MONTGOMERY, and Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for public schools, District of Columbia, submitted by the Commissioners of the District; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 109) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at South Omaha, in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 4283) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Cumberland, Md.; and

A bill (H. R. 2337) for the erection of a public building at Newport, Ky.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2576) for the erection of a public building at Paris, Ky.; and

A bill (S. 2409) granting certain lands in the abandoned military reservation at Fort McKinney, Johnson County, Wyo., to the State of Wyoming for public purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4952) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 444) making the surveyor of the District of Columbia a salaried officer, and to provide for more efficient service in the surveyor's office, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. HANSBROUGH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1717) to authorize the appointment of women as public-school trustees in the District of Columbia, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. HOAR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 655) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia and to regulate the proceeding before them;

A bill (H. R. 27) to increase the limit of cost for the erection of a public building at Paterson, N. J.

A bill (H. R. 4658) granting a pension to Hiram R. Rhea, and repealing an act approved March 3, 1871.

A bill (H. R. 5216) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891;

A bill (H. R. 5740) incorporating the Society of American Florists;

A bill (H. R. 7731) for the relief of certain Winnebago Indians in Minnesota, and

A bill (H. R. 8486) to relieve Abraham D. Prince.

PENSIONS.

Mr. STRONG, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions an act (S. 1876) to provide for the payment of accrued pensions in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the recess be taken now.

The SPEAKER. It lacks only a minute and a half of the regular time, and if there be no objection the Chair will now declare the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m. under the rule. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DOCKERY, will perform the duties of the Chair at the evening session.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. DOCKERY as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the rule applicable to Friday night sessions.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to, there being on a division (called for by Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina)—ayes 25, noes 0.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BRETZ in the chair).

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, before asking unanimous consent, as I shall do in a moment or two, for a special order of proceeding this evening, I wish to make a short statement. We can have at most but two more Friday evening sessions.

A MEMBER. Only one more.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Not a large number of Senate bills have been passed at these evening sessions. While I do not desire to refer to what takes place at the other end of the Capitol, yet there is some dissatisfaction on the ground that we have not disposed of very many Senate bills. I think that there are upon the Calendar altogether some forty bills coming from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I can not tell how many there are coming from the Committee on Pensions, of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] is chairman, probably thirty.

I do not know how many there are from the Committee on Military Affairs; and I believe there are none that we have a right to consider at a Friday night session coming from the Committee on the Judiciary. But this evening and next Friday evening will practically settle all that we can do upon this class of business during this Congress.

Whether the fact be to our credit or discredit, the work of this Congress in the passage of private pension bills has been smaller than that of any preceding Congress within my present recollection. This work has not been accomplished without a great deal of labor. We have had a great many Friday night sessions. And now that these sessions are coming to a close, and since the committees have given the work they have to these bills, reported them, and placed them on the Calendar, I suggest to every member here, not by way of lecture at all (for I am not given to lecturing), but in the interest of public business and in consideration of the rights of these people whose bills have been thus far reported—I suggest that we give special attention to business this evening.

Now, let me call attention to one thing. We have a Clerk who can make himself distinctly heard—a good reader—but what is the use of our Clerk reading a report while members all around are engaged in something else, paying no attention to the reading? And then the moment the reading is concluded and the question is put by the Chair, "Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable report," some member who has not been paying attention rises and says "I would like to know something about this bill," when in point of fact almost everything that he could desire to know might have been learned from the report if he had listened to the reading. We could proceed much more speedily without being rash or reckless at all.

I beg pardon of the Committee of the Whole for having said this much; but I wished to call attention to the shortness of the time remaining, the great amount of work that is still on our Calendar, the small number of bills that have been passed, and what we might yet accomplish if we will properly economize our time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a proposition for unanimous consent; and it is this: That the roll be called and that each member present when his name is reached may call up a bill introduced by himself or a Senate bill coming from the State in which he resides and a bill in which he is interested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent—

Mr. JONES. One question before that request is put. I wish to inquire whether this order of proceeding, if adopted, is expected to obtain next Friday night. If we should not complete the roll to-night, will the call be resumed next Friday evening where it stops to-night? I have no objection to the request of the gentleman if it is limited to to-night.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That is a question for the Chair to determine, as to the effect of the order.

Mr. JONES. The Chair has held that under such an order as this we are obliged to continue the roll call at the next evening session if it be not completed on the evening when it is begun. It has also been urged on this floor that it was wrong for any member to object to the continuance of the roll call on a subsequent evening—that such an objection was not fair or honest. If this request be limited to to-night, I have no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Before we settle the question, let me put this proposition: Suppose the roll should be called to-night halfway down, so that half the gentlemen present here are not reached. Would it be any more than fair that when we come together next Friday night the roll call should proceed from the point where it had stopped?

Mr. JONES. Let us determine that next Friday night when we assemble; let us not undertake to-night to fix an order for next Friday night.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not object to agreeing here and now that the order shall continue.

Mr. JONES. I wish to give notice that next Friday night I shall object to the continuance of this same order of business; but I will not object to the order if it be limited to to-night. I give this notice now, so that if I should object next Friday night gentlemen may not say that I sat here and consented to this order being made with the understanding that it should continue next Friday night.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Then I modify my request and ask unanimous consent, for the purpose I have expressed, for this evening only.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman state his request again?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That the roll be called and each member present, as his name is reached, be allowed to call up one bill introduced by himself, or a bill introduced by a Senator from the State he represents on this floor. I do not want to neglect the Senate bills and we ought not to do so. The order to be applicable to this evening only.

Mr. RYAN. I understand that if the roll call be not completed to-night, and we desire to continue it to its completion on next Friday night, the gentleman from Virginia indicates that he will object.

Mr. JONES. I did not mean to make that statement, but meant that if the effort was to fix the order to-night for next Friday, I would reserve my right to object at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana, the order to apply only to this evening?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HARRISON C. HOBART.

Mr. BALDWIN. I call up Senate bill 1969, granting a pension to Harrison C. Hobart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension rolls the name of Harrison C. Hobart, late brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. JONES. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. BALDWIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to Harrison C. Hobart, which passed the Senate August 5, 1894, and submit the following report:

The bill proposes to pension at $50 per month this soldier, whose service was as follows: Captain Company K, Fourth Wisconsin Infantry, from July 2, 1861; lieutenant-colonel Twenty-first Wisconsin Infantry from September 15, 1862; colonel of same regiment from November 1, 1864; commissioned brigadier-general by brevet to date January 12, 1865, and honorably discharged June 16, 1865.

It appears that this soldier has never applied for pension under the general laws, and nothing is shown in the Senate report as to his present physical or financial condition; but several witnesses testified before the committee from personal knowledge that he is very aged, utterly disabled, and absolutely without means.

If this man were pensioned under the general law for disability incurred in service, at the "total" rate for his rank, he would receive but $30 per month, and no reason appears why he should be given the exceptional rate of $50.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty" in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty;" and that as so amended the bill do pass.

For further statement of facts bearing on the case attention is invited to Senate report 649.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. I have known General Hobart for the last thirty years well and intimately, as a neighbor, as a friend, and as a public man in our State. General Hobart was one of the most honored citizens of Wisconsin long before the war broke out, and was one of the leading citizens in the State at the time. He was twice the candidate of his party for Congress in that State, and once a candidate for governor before the war, and once a candidate for governor since the war. He was among the foremost men and leading citizens of Wisconsin at that time. He was one of the first prominent, leading men in the State who raised a company and enlisted himself as a private. He was promptly elected captain of it. He had his company ready long before he could have it assigned to any regiment for service.

He went into the Army as captain of Company K, Fourth Wisconsin Infantry, which was changed afterwards to a cavalry command, and served there as captain for about a year and a half. He was then promoted and made lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-first Wisconsin. After General Sweet, the colonel of the regiment, was wounded, General Hobart had command of the regiment, and was afterwards taken prisoner and served for eight or nine months in Libby Prison. He was one of the two or three prisoners who devised the plan for getting out of the prison. He and Colonel Wells were, in fact, the promoters of the scheme to burrow out.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I trust he will not insist on his opposition to the amendment. The committee after due consideration reduced the amount in the Senate bill from $50 to $30. No application was made at the office, as the gentleman knows, for pension.

Mr. LYNCH. None. After his escape from Libby Prison he returned to his command, where he was promoted to a brigadier-general, and commanded a brigade to the close of the war.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. And I beg the gentleman will not insist on even prolonging his remarks.

Mr. LYNCH. But this is an exceptionally meritorious case. I know him well, and this committee can afford to understand the case; but I have no disposition to take any unnecessary time.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What would he get if he were allowed a pension under the general law?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But he is to be commended for not having gone to the Pension Office and made his application sooner.

Mr. LYNCH. And the fact that he has not been drawing a pension all these years is strong ground for granting him a pension now slightly in excess of what the law prescribes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Has he not an invalid wife living?

Mr. LYNCH. She has been paralyzed and bedridden for twelve years to my personal knowledge.

General Hobart met with financial reverses and misfortunes and has been reduced almost to poverty. I know that he has no income or visible means to help him in his old age. He is 80 years of age, and can draw this pension but a few years at the best. The fact that he was not an applicant for a pension heretofore, when entitled to it, ought to be to his advantage on this occasion and increase the amount of pension to him in his old age.

No more deserving man lives in the State; no braver man ever left the State and served in the Army of the Union, nor does a more gallant and faithful soldier live to-day in Wisconsin or elsewhere. He was too proud, patriotic, and honorable to ask for a pension, nor would his friends now, except from a sense of justice to him. He does not ask for it now. I do not know that this effort to get him a pension is with his knowledge at all. That is the style of man he is; and I think that such a man as that ought to receive a more kindly consideration. A man that has performed the service for the country that he did is certainly entitled to a little more than a strict technical construction of the rules of law that would restrict him to a smaller sum than justice entitles him to. I hope the amendment will not prevail; and that the Senate bill, which gives $50 a month, will remain as it is and will be agreed to by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask to reinstate a bill that went off the Calendar some time during my absence. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is the only one of its kind that I have asked any committee of Congress to consider during my term in Congress of eight years.

Mr. HAYES. Why did it go off the Calendar?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It went off the Calendar, as I understand, on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE]. The bill was reached in its regular order and was being considered. My colleague [Mr. STALLINGS], who is a member of the committee which considered the bill, had filed a minority report against the recommendations of the majority of the committee. There being no one here to represent the claimant when the bill was reached, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] moved that the bill be laid upon the table.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say that I hardly expect to have this bill considered during this session of Congress, but I feel a peculiar interest in having it reinstated and placed upon the Calendar, in order that if an opportunity should come I may submit some remarks touching this case and this claimant in reply to the criticisms of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that were passed upon it a few nights ago. Now I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reinstated.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have adopted a rule of procedure for this evening and that this motion can not be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Alabama that the committee can not reinstate a bill which is not on the Calendar. It would have to be done in the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee directed it to go off the Calendar, and I think by unanimous consent of the committee it could be reinstated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it could not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I beg leave to suggest to the Chair that when I asked unanimous consent a few nights ago to have this bill reinstated the present occupant of the chair then occupied the chair and held that the motion was in order. Of course, though, I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Alabama that the point did not occur to the Chair at that time that the bill had been ordered to be laid on the table by a former committee, and that the committee had no right to so reinstate it, as he holds now.

Mr. MOSES. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state further that the committee only recommended that the bill lie upon the table, and the House confirmed that action, and the committee can not reverse that action of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no other bill on the Calendar. It seems that I have not this one on the Calendar either. [Laughter.]

WEIR CRAWFORD.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, two weeks ago a bill was passed over with the right that I might call it up at this Friday night session. The bill (H. R. 6928) is a bill to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Weir Crawford.

Mr. Chairman, this bill was fully considered by the committee on last Friday night two weeks ago, and was passed over because a question was raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] upon a section of the statute which was supposed to apply to cases of this kind. It was laid aside without prejudice upon my request, that I might get the opinion of Colonel Ainsworth upon the section of the statute referred to, which was claimed by the gentleman from Virginia to apply to this case. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Weir Crawford, late of Company G, Fifty-second Regiment of Indiana Infantry Veteran Volunteers, and to issue said Crawford an honorable discharge from said service.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out the word "Weir" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Weir," and after the word "service," in line 8, insert the words "Provided, That no pay or allowance shall become due or payable by reason of this act."

Mr. BRETZ. I now send to the Clerk's desk a letter from Colonel Ainsworth touching this section of the statute to which the gentleman from Virginia referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 5, 1895.

SIR: In compliance with your personal request of yesterday for a statement of the ground upon which this Department has declined to remove the charge of desertion standing against Weir Crawford as a private of Company G, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteers, and in reply to your inquiry as to the bearing which section 4749 of the Revised Statutes has upon this and similar cases, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

The War Department is precluded from removing the charge of desertion and issuing an honorable discharge in this case by section 7 of the act approved March 2, 1889, the only law now in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion. This section provides that any soldier who left his command while "in arrest or under charges for breach of military duty" shall not be entitled to relief under the act; and it appears from the official records, as well as from the sworn statements made by the applicant himself in this case, that Crawford left his command while in arrest for a breach of military duty.

Section 4749, Revised Statutes, does not authorize the War Department to take any action in this case, or that of any other deserter from either the Regular or the Volunteer Army. As a matter of fact, it does not apply to either regulars or volunteers except in a very limited way, as will be shown by a glance at its concluding paragraph, which provides that "this section shall be construed solely as a removal of any disability such soldier or sailor may have incurred by the loss of his citizenship in consequence of his desertion." It will be readily seen, therefore, that this section does not authorize the removal of the charge of desertion, or the issue of an honorable discharge, or any correction or alteration whatever of a soldier's record.

It does not put a man whose final record is that of a deserter in the status of honor held by an honorably discharged soldier, nor does it relieve a deserter from any of the pains and penalties incurred by desertion except as to his citizenship and right to hold any office of trust or profit under the United States, which were forfeited by section 1900, Revised Statutes. But it has been held, and is now well settled, that this forfeiture can not be applied to a person until he has been tried by court-martial and found guilty of desertion. (See Kurtz vs. Moffit, 115 U. S., 501, and cases there cited.)

So that after all section 4749 applies only to the very inconsiderable number of persons who deserted after April 19, 1865, and who were also tried by court-martial and found guilty of desertion; and for them it does nothing at all but restore their citizenship and right to hold office. It is of no benefit whatever to the large class of men who deserted after April 19, 1865, but were not tried by court-martial and convicted of desertion. Nor is it of any benefit to a class which comprises by far the greatest number of deserters, viz, those who abandoned the service prior to April 19, 1865.

Very respectfully,

P. C. AINSWORTH.

Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. JOHN L. BRETZ,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BRETZ. Now, Mr. Chairman, if no one desires any further information, I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. BRETZ) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6923) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Wear Crawford, have considered the same and report as follows:

Wear Crawford was enrolled and mustered into the service as a private in Company G, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteers, January 14, 1863, to serve three years. He appears to have served faithfully to June 28, 1865, having reenlisted as a veteran volunteer February 27, 1864. The company morning report for June 28, 1865, shows him "absent in confinement," and for June 29, 1865, shows him "from confinement to absent without leave." The company muster roll, dated June 30, 1865, reports him "absent without leave since June 28, 1865," and that dated August 31, 1865, reports him "deserted August 11, 1865." The company muster-out roll, dated September 10, 1865, reports him "deserted at Montgomery, Ala., August 11, 1865."

With a view to correcting his said military record the said Wear Crawford, on July 19, 1886, filed with the proper authorities of the War Department an application for removal of the charge of desertion against him, and subsequently, on October 25, 1889, filed an affidavit, in which he states that at Montgomery, Ala., while he was on post, he halted an officer who was drunk and had no pass; that the officer shot at him three times, when he ran at the officer with his bayonet, whereupon he was arrested and put in the guardhouse, when he got frightened and left, and went to Mississippi.

Subsequently, on November 30, 1889, February 20, 1890, May 6, 1890, the said Wear Crawford filed with the War Department similar affidavits to the one of July 19, 1886, and in the latter affidavit calls attention to his long and faithful services, and says that at the time he had the altercation mentioned he did not know that his assailant was an officer; that he did not belong to his command, and he was only afterwards learned that he was an officer and was a captain in an Illinois regiment; that in his encounter with said assailant he was in strict line of duty, and acted in obedience with orders and faithful duty as a soldier.

On the evidence submitted the War Department denied him the relief sought, on the ground that "the admitted fact that he (the soldier) deserted while under arrest instead of remaining and meeting the charges against him, as he should have done, precludes favorable action under the law, and the application must therefore be again denied."

The following additional evidence was before the committee:

Of date December 16, 1891, the said Wear Crawford makes affidavit that he is the identical Wear Crawford who enlisted in Company F, First Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, for a period of three months, and was honorably discharged at Columbus, Ohio, by reason of expiration of term. That he again enlisted in the service of the United States as a private, Company G, Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, for a term of three years, on the 14th day of January, 1863, and was honorably discharged from said service on the 20th day of February, 1864, by reason of reenlistment as a veteran in same company and regiment.

That under his reenlistment as a veteran he served faithfully in Company G, Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, until the 11th day of August, 1865, when, without fault upon his part, he became involved in a difficulty with an officer of another organization, and under advice of comrades and friends he left the service while under arrest. That he subsequently enlisted in the service of the United States as a private in Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry Volunteers, for a term of five years from the 12th day of January, 1867, and was honorably discharged at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., on the 12th day of January, 1872.

That his record as a soldier during all of said services is unassailable with the single incident above referred to, wherefore he asks the Congress of the United States to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to amend his military record by removing the charge of desertion from Company G, Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Veteran Volunteers, and directed to grant an honorable discharge from said service.

Subsequently, of date January 9, 1892, the said Wear Crawford, in an affidavit of that date, says: That while in said service he was on duty at an outpost and had orders to allow no one to pass the lines either way who did not show a pass from the proper officer. While in the performance of his duty as a sentinel an officer attempted to cross his post into town and, after being challenged, refused to show a pass. Claimant attempted to stop him. He refused to acknowledge that the claimant had any right to either detain or molest him. In the quarrel which followed the officer attempted to shoot the claimant with a pistol. Claimant also snapped his gun, but did not fire.

Claimant pursued the officer with his bayonet for some distance. The officer had claimant arrested and he was put in the guardhouse, where he remained for several days, when he was persuaded by his comrades to leave (after they had furnished him with money) by telling him that the officer no doubt would have him severely punished, and that the war was then over, etc. He allowed them to persuade him, and he left the service on August 11, 1865.

Of date August 31, 1891, Alfred C. Pearsey makes oath as follows:

"I was a member of Company G, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and well knew Wear Crawford, of said company, who was a good and faithful soldier, never flinching from duty in battle or at any other time, and who is charged with desertion, which does him great injustice. He was persuaded by his comrades against his own inclinations to leave for fear of a more severe punishment on account of a personal difficulty with an officer who exceeded his duty as such, thus bringing on the difficulty, as I was informed at the time by a comrade who was then present, but now dead.

"The sympathy of our comrades who knew the circumstances was all with Private Crawford, and joined in persuading him to leave, fearing and believing that he would be unmercifully punished for his trouble with an officer. The war was over, and no further need of our services seemed necessary, and I loaned him money to go away with, believing I was doing a just and meritorious service in saving a good soldier from rigorous punishment by a tyrannical officer from another command. I know to a certainty that he had no desire to desert the Army, and he would not have done so had he not been overpersuaded by his comrades, who thought it the best thing for him to do."

His colonel, captain, and lieutenant, all testify to Crawford's long and faithful service, and obedience to orders, etc.

In view of the long and faithful service of this soldier, and in view of the fact that he did not leave his command with the intention of deserting, but merely to avoid the possible severe punishment he might receive for a supposed breach of military duty, the committee report the bill back to the House with the following amendment, and recommend that the bill do pass:

Provided, That no pay or allowance shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCKAIG). The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 1.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MAJ. GEN. JULIUS H. STAHEL.

Mr. CAMPBELL (when his name was called). Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 6901) to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Julius H. Stahel, late major-general of volunteers in the Union Army, and pay same at the rate of $100 per month, in lieu of what he now receives, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, would it not be acceptable for the gentleman introducing this bill to state the substance of it without reading these long and tedious reports? Many of these reports are long, very much longer than they need to be to express the facts; and if the member states what they are it enables the committee to form an opinion upon the merits, and then we can vote and get through with many more bills.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to that, nor can I agree with my friend from New York that these reports are longer than they should be. I have discovered in my experience that many of them are too short; that they leave out a great many matters of importance that bear upon the case. I think that with reference to a bill that involves a pension of $100 the report should be read.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I withdraw my request if it tends to excite discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. HICKS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BRETZ). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. I was not here when the House opened this evening, and therefore I inquire why the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMPBELL] is permitted to call up a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was obtained to call the roll, beginning at the head, and each member when his name is called is to have the privilege of calling up a bill that he introduced himself or a Senate bill in which he was interested.

Mr. HICKS. Unfortunately my name is about the middle of the roll—

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Your turn will come soon.

Mr. HICKS. Just when my turn is reached on the call of the roll they will return to the consideration of bills in their order on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If this were not a case of charity I would give the gentleman my turn.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like, before the report is read, to make an inquiry. The Chair has stated what the rule was, and that rule was that a gentleman could call up a bill introduced by himself, or a Senate bill in which he was interested. I would like to ask by whom this bill was introduced.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This bill was introduced by myself, at the request of a large number of gentlemen in this country.

The report (by Mr. RYAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6801) to increase to $100 per month the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel, respectfully report:

Julius H. Stahel was a Hungarian nobleman, who enlisted under Kossuth and fought with him in the patriot uprising against the Austrians in 1849. On the suppression of that movement he was obliged to flee from his native land, and in 1854 came to the United States, where he was engaged in the publication of a newspaper at the breaking out of the war of the rebellion.

Under the call of President Lincoln he enlisted as a private, April 23, 1861, and continued in active service in the field, being promoted meanwhile, for meritorious conduct, through the various grades of rank to that of major-general, until after the battle of Piedmont, June 5, 1864, when, in consequence of a wound received in that battle, he was ordered to Harpers Ferry for the purpose of collecting and organizing troops.

He was subsequently ordered to Baltimore on court-martial duty, and continued on such until February 8, 1865, when, failing to recover his health, he resigned.

The Official Records of the Rebellion, a few extracts from which are hereto appended, bear ample testimony to the valuable services rendered to the Union cause by General Stahel, as the Congressional medal which was awarded him for distinguished gallantry at the battle of Piedmont is a merited and grateful tribute to his personal bravery.

After the close of the war he was appointed to a position in the consular service and remained in such service about thirteen years, when, in consequence of ill health, engendered, it is said, by disease contracted in the Army, he was obliged to resign.

How his services as consular agent were appreciated is shown by the following letter from Secretary Bayard:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 24, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: I have this moment received your letter of this date, resigning the position of consul-general at Shanghai, and make unfeigned expression of my sincere regret that the Government is to lose the services of so efficient and faithful an officer. And permit me to say how much my regret is increased by the cause of your resignation.

The record of your public service is unimpeachable, and I sincerely trust that in your new pursuit you may fully recover the health you have lost, and with it enjoy an ample and prolonged prosperity.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Gen. JULIUS STAHEL.

After partially recovering his health he secured a business position in the city of New York, in which he continued until recurring disease, infirmities, and the burdens of old age compelled his final retirement from active life.

Although entitled to a pension since his resignation, in 1865, he did not apply until 1893. Since February, 1893, he has been in receipt of $30 per month, the amount he would have been allowed had he made application during the previous twenty-eight years.

He is now in his sixty-ninth year, and in needy circumstances.

Your committee think he is fairly entitled to the pension applied for, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF POTOMAC,
Steamer Commodore, April 2, 1862.

MY DEAR STAHEL: I can not express to you the regret I feel on parting from you both personally and officially. I had hoped to have you with me. The order ordering the division army from the Army of the Potomac was given without my knowledge.

I do not know that I can arrange it, but would like to know whether it would be agreeable to you personally, under all the circumstances, to join me again if it is possible to effect it.

Please let me hear from you about it. Whatever the result may be and wherever you may go you will ever have my warm regard.

Trusting that we shall meet again, I am, your sincere friend,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Maj. Gen. JULIUS STAHEL.

GENERAL: I regret that when you left my command I did not know what disposition would be made of the cavalry. I have seen General Hooker and many of the officers of his command, and they have expressed themselves in the most unqualified praise of the splendid condition of your cavalry. They declared it the best they had ever seen.

Their good condition and efficiency are owing to the able manner in which you have commanded them.

I can assure you that I parted with you and them with many regrets.

Maj. Gen. JULIUS STAHEL,
Camp Instructions, etc.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF WEST VIRGINIA,
Staunton, Va., June 9, 1864.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that in consequence of a wound received while gallantly leading his division in the recent battle of the 5th instant, at Piedmont, I have relieved Maj. Gen. Julius Stahel from service with the forces in the field, and have ordered him to Martinsburg and Harpers Ferry for the purpose of collecting and organizing all troops that can be spared from the defense of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and returning to this army in charge of the important train about which I have had the honor to telegraph to you in cipher. I beg that if you can aid General Stahel to collect the detachments belonging to this command from the dismantled camp in Pleasant Valley, Md., you will do so, and that you will be kind enough to forward his views under the instructions he has received.

It is but justice to Major-General Stahel to state that in the recent engagement he displayed excellent qualities of coolness and gallantry, and that for the final happy result the country is much indebted to his services.

I part with General Stahel with regret, and trust, most respectfully, that there will be no delay in forwarding the train with which—and the troops collected at Martinsburg, Harpers Ferry, from the Kanawha, and Pleasant Valley, if possible—he is to return.

I have the honor to be, General,

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

D. HUNTER, Major-General.

Official:

CHAS. S. HALPINE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK,
Chief of Staff, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

BALTIMORE, MD., February 10, 1865.

DEAR GENERAL: I learn with sincere regret that you have resigned your commission and are about to retire into private life. At this occasion, so unexpected to myself, as it must be to everyone who justly values your services of four years' duration, I feel it my duty to thank you for the faithful and excellent assistance you have given to me, when serving with me as a brigade and division commander, and as commander of the Eleventh Corps, Army of the Potomac, when it formed part of the Fourth Grand Division commanded by me. I also will never forget the valuable services rendered by you as chief and commander of the cavalry of the army of West Virginia when I held command of that army and department. You know very well that I would not show you my confidence better than by intrusting you with the command of the troops which formed the army of the Shenandoah in the spring of 1864.

In many engagements, especially those on the Rappahannock and at the battle of Groveton and Bull Run in 1862, before Washington in 1863, and at New Market in 1864, I had good opportunity to become aware of your excellent qualities as a commander, whilst your incessant labors on long and fatiguing marches, your success in organizing, drilling, and disciplining troops, as well as your bravery in battle, will be and are duly acknowledged by the many thousands who have been under your command.

To have done your duty as a citizen of this Republic in the hour of danger and under so many adversities, fatigues, and even misfortunes, to be respected by your comrades in arms as a perfect gentleman, as a soldier and commander, must be your best reward at this moment, when by extraordinary proceedings and by a just regard for your honor you have found it necessary to quit the service.

My best and sincerest wishes for your success and welfare will accompany you in your future career.

Very truly and respectfully, your friend,

F. SIGEL, Major-General.

Maj. Gen. JULIUS STAHEL.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say a few words in regard to the distinguished gentleman whose case is now under consideration, but I think the report speaks for itself; and if the gentleman from Virginia will cheerfully support the measure I accept his proposition, because I know if there ever was a genuine, patriotic, and charitable measure this is one.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman's proposition to cheerfully support this measure, because I think that $50 is enough. I shall certainly vote for my amendment reducing the amount from $100 to $50.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York how much pension is being paid to this gentleman at the present time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thirty dollars a month. If he had applied for a pension in 1865 or 1868 he would have then been entitled to that much pension; but he refused to take a cent from the Government until old age incapacitated him from performing any labor or service.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, we are proceeding here from day to day and night to night passing pension bills, and doing it in the name of the ex-soldiers of the Union Army. We have now reached a condition of things when applicants for pensions, instead of presenting their claims to the Pension Bureau, a Bureau prepared for that purpose, a Bureau that is amply competent to pass upon that class of claims, applicants go by the Bureau and come to Congress. Why? Because if they go to the Pension Bureau they are not able to receive the amount of pension that they think they are individually entitled to.

Recently it has occurred that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is crowded at every session, not for the purpose of passing pension bills for the benefit of all the soldiers who served in the Union Army, but for the purpose of crowding through the committee and through Congress bills to increase the pensions of officers or to increase the pensions of widows of officers from $30 to $100 per month. The pension rolls to-day are being loaded down with exorbitant pensions, not to private soldiers, not to officers of moderate rank, but with pensions to the widows of officers who were fortunate enough to have received their education at the hands of the Government of the United States, or who have gone into the service as brigadiers-general, never enduring the hardships that private soldiers were compelled to endure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state in this case Major-General Stahel entered the Army as a private soldier and worked his way up to the position of major-general.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I am protesting against the principle that is being enacted here into law day after day. I have stood here and seen this Congress repeatedly increase the pension of the widows of officers. I have seen this Congress give to a woman who had married the soldier, I am told, sixteen years after the war, a pension of $100 a month. At the same time I know that the men who fought side by side with that officer were as gallant as he and performed their duty as well as he performed his, and those men when they joined the Army, many of them, left wives behind them who remained at home and cared for the soldiers' children and did as much as the wife of a brigadier-general or a major-general, while neither they nor their husbands had the strong incentives that the officers and their wives had.

I protest in the name of the widows of private soldiers, thousands and thousands of them, who are just as worthy as the widows of the officers—I protest in the name of the private soldiers themselves who are unable to receive any pension against this policy of granting high pensions to officers and their widows, to the prejudice of the men who really fought the battles and saved the Union. I care not what others may say about it; I speak for myself, and I think I know that I speak for a great majority of the men who fought on the side of the Union, when I say that the idea of singling out a few favorites, singling out those who are now receiving $30 a month and increasing their pensions to $50 or $100 a month, is an insult to the brave men who really fought the battles of the Republic.

Who is it that is entitled to the credit of saving the Union? Is it the men who commanded brigades or the men who commanded a division, or is it the men who took their muskets in their hands and went forth into the midst of the battle? I have not occupied much of the time of this committee. This is the first occasion on which I have occupied as much as five minutes, and I do not propose that gentlemen shall stop my mouth by sitting here and saying that they are anxious to get their bills through.

If you will take up such bills, gentlemen, as ought to go through, I will be with you. If you will undertake to pass such bills as ought to be passed, I will be with you. I look forward to the time when full and ample justice shall be done to the men—and there are some 400,000 of them, I think—who are not on the pension rolls at all, and are receiving no pensions. I look forward to the time when justice shall be done to all those men, but I know that it can not be done if we are going to load up the pension roll with pensions of $100 a month to officers and their widows, until it becomes so weighted down that the people will say to us, "You can not afford to make appropriations to increase the pensions to private soldiers."

The man in whose behalf this bill is presented is now receiving as much pension as the general law allows to anybody in his class.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Move to amend the amendment so as to make the amount $30 a month instead of $50.

Mr. STRONG. No, sir; it does not require any amendment. He is now receiving the greatest pension that is allowed to anybody in his class under the general law, and therefore I hope this bill to increase his pension will be laid on the table.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, like my colleague on the committee [Mr. STRONG] I have been in constant attendance at these Friday night sessions during this Congress, and, as the RECORD will show, I have not occupied even so much time as five minutes in addressing the committee, and I do not intend to break that somewhat desirable record on the present occasion for longer than a couple of minutes. There is, in my judgment, one feature of this case that has perhaps not been clearly brought out, but which makes it especially meritorious.

That point is, that for twenty-eight years after the close of the war the beneficiary under this bill never asked a pension from the Government, although he could have received it for the asking. He felt that he could earn his own living, and, while he was able to do that, he was too proud to ask the Government to pension him for doing what he was glad to have been able to do, to serve to the best of his ability the Government of his adopted country, under whose flag he and his compatriots had found a home and a refuge. He enlisted as a private soldier within one week after President Lincoln issued his first call for volunteers, on the 23d of April, 1861.

He fought until February 8, 1865, when in consequence of disease contracted in the service, and of a wound received in the battle of Piedmont, and for specially gallant services in which he has received a Congressional medal, he was obliged to resign his commission as major-general. He supported himself for twenty-eight years and laid by as he thought a sufficient sum to support him in old age. The institution in which he had deposited his savings failed, and the only shield which he had provided against poverty in his declining years was swept away. He is now, I believe, in his seventy-first year. He comes to Congress and asks that he be given a small portion of that money which he could have drawn and which in justice and equity belongs to him as much as though he had had it in the savings bank during the last twenty-eight years. I hope no objection will be made to the bill, especially since at the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] the allowance has been reduced to one-half that recommended by the committee.

Mr. JONES. Has he anybody dependent on him?

Mr. RYAN. He has not.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, it may seem strange that a Representative from my section of the country should stand here and advocate the pensioning of a Federal officer. But this gentleman of whom we have heard during this discussion served in my section of Virginia as a commanding officer; and he treated the people of that section so kindly that for days past Confederate soldiers and Confederate officers have been writing here to their friends in this House asking that this pension may be increased.

He treated with respect the wives and families of those people who were opposing him, and thereby he won the admiration of Confederate soldiers, who, as I have said, are asking by letters that now in his declining years his pension be increased. He was a worthy officer; he served his Government with credit and distinction both at home and abroad. For twenty-eight years, as has been stated by my friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. RYAN], he never made any demand upon the Government for one cent of pension money. And now, when he has arrived at the age of 71, when his fortune has been swept from him and he is practically without the means of support, it would be niggardly on the part of this Government to refuse to pass this bill, especially after it has been amended so as to make the amount of the pension only $50 a month. I shall support the bill with pleasure. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG. When was this pension of $30 a month granted?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. In 1893.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pension wherein lies the distinction between this case and that of General Hobart, which has just been passed upon, unless it be that General Hobart was a native American and this man a foreign nobleman? General Hobart's claim is reported at $30 a month; this man's at $100. I should like the gentleman from Indiana to explain why the committee thus discriminates.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the time of the committee; but I will say very frankly that in the Committee on Invalid Pensions I voted against the allowance of any amount in this case beyond $30. So far as I am personally concerned, I have treated General Hobart's case and this case on exactly the same terms. I do not think, however, it is necessary for me to take up time. The facts are all plainly before the committee. I think we should now vote.

The question being taken on the amendment striking out "$100" and inserting "$50," it was agreed to.

The question being taken on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported favorably to the House, it was agreed to; there being on a division (called for by Mr. JONES)—ayes 41, noes 3.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Clerk was proceeding to call the roll, when—

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE said: Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably detained to-night, and therefore was absent when my name was called. I should like to have unanimous consent to call up a bill.

Mr. HICKS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. This is no personal favor that I am asking for myself. I simply desire to oblige a soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his objection?

Mr. HICKS. I withdraw the call for the regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object.

CHARITY ANN SMITH.

Mr. CAPEHART (when his name was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 575) granting a pension to Charity Ann Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charity Ann Smith, mother of R. Monroe Wiley, late a private in Company G, Thirtieth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month from the approval of this act.

The report (by Mr. HARE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 575) granting a pension to Charity Ann Smith, have considered the same and now submit the following report:

The claimant is the mother of R. Monroe Wiley, late a member of Company G, Thirtieth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers. He enlisted February 18, 1865, and was discharged May 22, 1865, having served in all ninety-three days. The soldier died, the date not stated.

He left a widow, who died October 3, 1874, and two children, both of whom are also dead. The children were pensioned until they arrived at the age of 16 years, because of soldier's death from disabilities, the result of his service. The claimant testifies that she was dependent upon her son, the soldier, for support, but had to look after the care and maintenance of the surviving children after the soldier's death; that she is now old and feeble and unable to earn a living, and that there is no one legally bound for her support. A number of witnesses, neighbors and acquaintances, testify to her present destitute condition and her inability to earn a living by manual labor.

Oscar N. Greer and William Chapman, of Ambrosia, W. Va., testify that the soldier was the petitioner's only son and contributed to her support by money both before and after his enlistment, and that she was dependent upon him to a great degree.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to make a special exception in favor of the mother of this soldier. It appears from the report that the soldier's service was limited to ninety-three days—a very short term of service, indeed. I should like to have some statement from the gentleman in charge of the bill showing the special merit of this case, because if we are going to pension the mothers of soldiers I think such cases ought to have exceptional merit.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. Chairman, this soldier, it is true, enlisted late in the war; but he served till the war closed, as long as there was any necessity for his service. He received an honorable discharge from the service, and was the only support of his mother. Living witnesses testify that he contributed to her support. He left two children who drew a pension until they became 16 years of age, when the pension ceased. They are now dead, as well as his wife; and the old lady, his mother, is left without any support in the world. She is now, I suppose, between seventy and eighty years of age.

Mr. JONES. How does she live now?

Mr. CAPEHART. Well, by her own exertions. She has no property of any description and is entirely destitute.

Mr. JONES. You say her age is what?

Mr. CAPEHART. Over 70.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply, in addition to what the gentleman from West Virginia has said, to state that there are precedents, not very numerous it is true, for this class of cases, but still there are precedents.

While it is true that the soldier did not serve very long, yet, as the report of the committee shows, he contracted the disability from which he died, and for which his minor children were pensioned, in the service. His widow and children are all dead. His mother was in a large measure dependent upon him, and the question arises whether it is not a simple act of justice for Congress, in the exercise of its power and following the precedents justifying it, to allow the old mother to have a pension during the remaining few days that she can possibly remain on earth. She is quite aged.

Now, had this soldier died, as he did, as the result of his service, without leaving any children, the mother would have been entitled under the general law to a pension. But having left a widow and children, and they having died, the only way that she can receive aid at the hands of the Government is by a special bill, for the reason that this pension can not be granted under the general law by the office.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

BARZILLA C. HUDSON.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7177) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Barzilla C. Hudson, late of Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, and grant him an honorable discharge.

The report (by Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia) was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred House bill 1310, for the relief of John H. Willis, having had the same under consideration, report as follows: John H. Willis enlisted in Company E, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on the 25th day of April, 1861, to serve three years. It appears from the records of the War Department that he served faithfully with his command from said date until October 20, 1862, when he was discharged from said service by reason of his transfer to the Regular Army, and the records of said Department show that on the 21st day of October, 1862, he enlisted in Battery B, Fourth United States Artillery, at Suffolk, Va.; that he was discharged January 31, 1864, at Portsmouth, Va., by reason of reenlistment; that he reenlisted in the same battery February 1, 1864, and served with said company until May 26, 1865, when he deserted at Camp Lincoln, Virginia.

The chief of the Record and Pension Office further reports:

"No information with regard to this soldier has been found upon the hospital records from 1861 to 1865, inclusive."

Said John H. Willis, as appears from the records of the War Department, served faithfully from April 25, 1861, until May 26, 1865, at which time, he says, he received information to the effect that his wife was seriously ill. He attempted to obtain a furlough, but was told by his captain that he could not get a furlough, and the war being over, he went home without leave; that his said wife remained quite sick for a considerable time, and that he, after being at home some weeks, was taken sick, and remained quite sick and unable to return to his command, and that when he did recover, the war being over, he did not return.

The fact of the serious illness of wife of said John H. Willis at said time is shown by testimony of two of his neighbors, as is also the illness of himself. In view of the facts in this case and the long and faithful service of said John H. Willis, your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the correction of the military record of soldiers where it can be shown that the charge of desertion improperly rests against them. I have already taken occasion to say more than once on the floor of the House that I do not know of a class of cases which appeals to Congress more strongly than this class. The charge of desertion improperly and unjustly resting against a soldier should be removed. I know that there are cases where it has been shown that prejudice on the part of an officer against a soldier caused that soldier to be unjustly branded with the charge of desertion.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that a soldier's record ought to be corrected for the purpose of allowing such soldier to obtain a pension when there is no excuse given whatever for the desertion. I understand that there were 200,000 deserters from the Federal Army during the war; and I do not suppose, from the reading of this report, that there is a single one of the whole 200,000 who can not give as good an excuse for his desertion as is given in the case of this man.

I admit that his service in the Army was longer and more meritorious, as set forth in the report, than the service of a good many other deserters. But I do not think that ought to be taken into consideration as an excuse for this bill when it is clearly and fairly established that the man deserted without any good reason being even offered, and it is not pretended that there was any good reason existing.

In a great many cases which come before the House the only testimony that we have to rely upon is that of the deserter himself, who undertakes to assign reasons for his desertion. There was a case before the committee this evening of somewhat that character, where the testimony was chiefly that of the deserter himself. It is true that in that case one of the comrades of the man testified as to the cause of desertion, and that he had loaned him money with which to return home, as he was under arrest improperly, in his belief, for assaulting a man that he did not know at the time was an officer. There was some excuse offered in that case and some testimony other than that of the deserter.

But here is a case where the man does not offer the slightest excuse for his conduct. He simply says that he was a good soldier; that he went through a great part of the war, and that it was nearly over at the time he deserted; that he had served faithfully, and that there was practically no more fighting to be done, and therefore he returned home, and that he afterwards resided there quietly. Now, there is no provocation alleged in this case for the desertion. The deserter does not claim that he was a boy of tender years, and that he did not understand the regulations of the Army. That is frequently the excuse offered. It appears that he had enlisted and reenlisted more than once, and how many times he received bounty for reenlistment the report does not disclose; but at all events he had reenlisted and knew the Army regulations. He was not a youth but a full-grown man, and does not plead ignorance as to the Army Regulations.

Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that that presents a case sufficiently meritorious to influence this committee to remove the charge of desertion against a man and place him on the pension rolls to receive the same consideration from the Government which it now gives to the men who served faithfully and honestly and who were honorably discharged at the close of the war. I submit that it is not a case that should appeal to this House; and if we are to remove the charge of desertion in this case and allow a pension we had as well pass a general law correcting the military record of every single deserter who served faithfully for any period, no matter how short, and who had no excuse for deserting the Army and the cause it was his duty to serve, and the country which had a right to demand his services.

I submit that this is a case where we ought to draw the line, and I hope the gentleman presenting this bill will withdraw it, and not block the progress of other measures with a bill which possesses as little merit as this.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that there is a precedent for the passage of this bill, and not more than three Friday evenings ago we passed one precisely like it. I do not remember the name of the applicant now; but I wish, however, to satisfy the gentleman on one or two points mentioned by him which seem to have some influence, in his judgment, in the matter.

This soldier enlisted in April, 1861, in the volunteer service for a period of three years. The point to which I wish to invite the gentleman's attention is this: It occurs to the gentleman from Virginia that possibly this soldier might have obtained one or more bounties. On the contrary, he enlisted in the volunteer service in April, 1861, for a period of three years. He never reenlisted in the volunteer service at any time. During the term of the three years they found it necessary to recruit some battery, I think, in West Virginia.

The battery service was extra hazardous. He was a large, strong man, and he is an ignorant man. I know him well. He tells me in his plain way that they needed him at the guns, and they asked him if he would work there, and he said he was willing to work wherever they needed him, and he took his place in the Fourth Artillery Battery. Now, as a matter of bookkeeping and record, he was enlisted in the Regular Army, but he did not know it. He tells me that he did not know it. He was, however, at that time transferred to the Regular Army. Now, he served for the balance of his three years as a member of this battery.

The war was not then over. He had enlisted, as he understood it, for that war, and at the end of his three years, the war not being over, he reenlisted in the Regular Army in this same battery. There was no bounty given for that service. There was no advantage accruing to him by it. He gained nothing whatever, but made the sacrifice of assuming an extra hazardous position in the service at the request of those who had charge of his division. Now, he served from that time on in this battery until the close of the war.

He served in all four years and one month. During that time he never went home. I have examined his military record, and I find that he was reported sick once, but with his command. He was not a hospital soldier. He fought from the beginning of the war until the 26th day of May, 1865, in a place which any soldier who knows anything about the service will say was extra hazardous.

There is not anything about the case to indicate that the man had profited by it in any way whatever. I say to the gentleman from Virginia that I know this man. He is an honest old man. He returned to his home after the war. As he said, all the rest of the boys went home and he went along, and he did not know that he was a deserter until about a year or so ago.

The circumstance came up in this wise: He was granted a pension under the administration of General Black for disabilities incurred in the service. Under some new ruling or change of ruling in the Department this charge of desertion was discovered, and his pension was cut off. He did not know until he was notified by the Department that he had ever had the charge recorded against him of having been a deserter, because he knew that he had done his duty, that he had served throughout the entire war in a place that was most hazardous, and where he had been assigned to duty.

I believe he tells the truth when he says that he never even knew that he was in the Regular Army. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] surely will not raise an objection to this bill, full of merit as it is, and I appeal to him that he will not raise any objection to it on account of any possible feeling that may exist against the gentleman who proposed the bill. I appeal only for the soldier, for what seems to be right.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I certainly shall not raise any objection to this bill, and have not raised any objection to it, on account of any relations that may exist between the gentleman from Indiana and myself.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me, I say that only because I remember distinctly that on a previous occasion a bill just like this was passed through the House.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is mistaken in saying that a bill just like this was ever passed since I have had the honor of being a member of Congress. I am not informed as to the character of the bills that passed before I became a member of Congress. I know that many hundreds of bills—or at least I am told that many hundreds of bills—passed in the Fifty-first Congress, and the gentleman from Indiana may remember a case similar to this passed by that Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I speak of a case which passed a few nights ago.

Mr. JONES. I know that there are precedents for this character of legislation, but I think none can be cited for a case like the one now under consideration. That many bills have been passed removing the charge of desertion all will admit.

I know full well that it has been the habit of this Congress and of previous Congresses to remove the charge of desertion where Congress has been convinced that there was an injustice in the charge and that it rested improperly against the applicant. I stated in the beginning that I knew of no more meritorious cases than those; but I have always taken the ground that the charge of desertion should never be removed from any deserter upon the testimony of the deserter alone and that after the expiration of thirty years. I have never yet known a case in this Congress where the testimony was that alone of the deserter where the charge was removed.

I submit that the gentleman can not produce a precedent of this sort; and even if he could, I appeal to the sense of right and justice of this House against the passage of such a measure. I have listened carefully to what the gentleman has said. I do not doubt the meritorious character of the service of this man, but I do question the propriety of Congress removing the charge of desertion when that charge is to be removed upon the testimony of the deserter himself.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES. I will; certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Have you observed the fact that this soldier served until the 26th day of May, 1865, and that by the general law, if he had been in the volunteer service instead of in the Regular Army, he would have been entitled to a discharge under the general law? Now, is it not raising a technical objection, because he was really a volunteer soldier, who never was in the Regular Army in a regular way, but was technically in the Regular Army? If treated as a volunteer soldier, as we think he ought to have been, he would have been entitled to his discharge; but the language of that general law was not sufficient to cover his case, because he was technically in the Regular Army, and it is only because of that technicality that we are obliged to come here.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is doubtless more familiar with the general law than I am. I understand there is a general law that all soldiers who served until the 10th of April, 1865, and who deserted after that period shall have the charge of desertion against them removed. If that is the law to which the gentleman refers, and I suppose it is, a construction of that law has been read from the Clerk's desk this evening. I understand now, from the construction placed upon that law by the War Department, that it does not apply unless the soldier was court-martialed. That is the construction I understand the Department has placed upon that law. I took the same view that the gentleman did until to-night. But I am now informed that a different construction has been placed upon that law. But, however that may be, the cases that have received the favorable consideration of this committee have been cases where we have been appealed to on account of the youth of the persons charged with desertion, and generally there has been other testimony to support the statement made by the deserter.

Now, I assert that there has never been a case, and none can be cited, where this Congress or the Fifty-second Congress has removed the charge of desertion on the testimony alone of the deserter. I submit that it is wrong to pass bills upon such unsupported testimony. I submit that if it be right to do it upon the testimony of this man, you ought to remove the charge against all the 200,000 men who deserted from the Army during the war; because I do not doubt that there never was a man who deserted who would not offer some excuse to have this charge against him removed.

Mr. MOSES. I hope the gentleman will remember that in this case the evidence is that this soldier fought for four years without going home. In other words, he stayed with the Army when there was fighting to be done, and only went home when hostilities had ceased. Now, do you think such a brave man as that would lie?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; I have known and the gentleman has known such men. I am not charging this man with lying. But I have known and the gentleman has known brave men who would be guilty of that offense.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The whole Roman army, it is known, would lie, and yet they were good fighters.

Mr. JONES. That is a good reply to the gentleman's statement. But I do submit that it is not right, it is not just to the Union soldiers who fought during the war, who were honorably discharged and are on the pension roll, that we should, on the unsupported testimony of the deserter himself, remove the charge of desertion and put him on that roll with honorable soldiers. If there was any testimony in this record to support this man's statement or did he offer an excuse for his conduct his case might be different, but he does not offer an excuse. The only thing he says is that he served faithfully for four years, and I do not think that is a sufficient atonement for his offense. At least I do not think he should now be pensioned and rewarded for his desertion.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I do not want to interfere with the general discussion of pensioning deserters, which the gentleman has discussed, and shall not do so.

Mr. Chairman, the Thirteenth Indiana was at one time under my own command, and as a member of the committee reporting this bill I have carefully examined the facts. In 1862 there was a request made from the War Department for volunteers who were willing to serve for the remainder of their term in volunteer batteries. At that time I was commanding a company, and men went from my own company. At the end of the service of the regiment the men that had not reenlisted went home. Some of them belonged to regiments that veteranized, as it was termed. The Thirteenth Indiana was one of that kind. This man was absent from his regiment on a detail, by his own consent, and instead of veteranizing he enlisted in the Regular Army. He did not know the difference.

I want to say to my friend from Virginia that I have personally examined this case and understand it. I have never during either of my terms in Congress or before I came here asked for the restoration of a man who was really a deserter, and I do not expect ever to ask for it, but this is not a genuine case of desertion. This man was serving in a battery. He enlisted there, not understanding the difference. When his regiment went home he wanted to go home, and there was no objection to his going except that he was reported absent without leave, and—

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Suppose this man had not been transferred to that artillery service, but had (to use the gentleman's own term) veteranized, would he, under the operation of the general law, have had this charge of desertion against him removed?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir; and he would have gone home at the time his regiment went. There were cases where men enlisted as this man did in the Regular Army, being ignorant of the difference, and the officers, understanding it, looked after the discharge of those men, and they were discharged on application. Had the officers of the regiment remembered this man and applied for his discharge he would have been discharged and would have gone home with his regiment. These are facts of which I have personal knowledge, and I think the gentleman from Virginia will be satisfied that this was not a case of genuine desertion.

Mr. JONES. I will say just a word in conclusion, Mr. Chairman. I appeal to the House not to remove this charge against this man. I do so because I do not think such a charge ought to be removed merely upon the man's own statement. If we pass this bill it will be used as a precedent hereafter which will come home to plague us. I do not know but some gentleman who has a similar bill pending, a bill perhaps without the slightest merit, may get up and ask to have it considered simply because this one has been passed.

The gentleman who calls up this bill has said that there are precedents. I do not think there are precedents for just this kind of a case; but if we pass this bill to-night we will set a precedent that will give us trouble in the future, and I appeal to the House upon the vote which we are about to take to refuse to grant the relief which this deserter asks for upon his own unsupported testimony. I do not question for a moment what has been stated by the patron of the bill, but he frankly tells us that he gets his information from the deserter, so that the alleged facts come from the deserter himself after all.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I have given the gentleman more information than is furnished by the beneficiary.

Mr. JONES. I admit that there is some force in what the gentleman from New York has said about this man's transfer and about what would have been the result if he had not been transferred, but I hardly think it would be sufficient to justify the action proposed in this bill.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 4; so the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALOMA MANGOLD.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas (when his name was called). Mr.

Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 8264) granting a pension to Saloma Mangold, of Carbondale, State of Kansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act approved June 27, 1890, the name of Saloma Mangold, of Carbondale, State of Kansas, widow of Philip Mangold, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-second Illinois.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 8264) to pension Saloma Mangold, and submit the following report:

The petitioner asks for pension as the widow of Philip Mangold, who served in Company F, Eighty-second Illinois Infantry, from July 1, 1862, until December 30, 1862. He applied for pension January 7, 1883, but failed to prosecute the claim. He disappeared from his home about June, 1894, and has never been seen or heard from by his friends since that time. If living he must now be 80 years of age.

The widow's claim under the act of June 27, 1890, was rejected by the Pension Bureau for the reason that the death of the soldier can not be definitely proven. The claim was investigated by Special Examiner T. F. Dennis, whose report in 1893 shows that the claimant is of good reputation, about 76 years of age, and dependent on others for subsistence. It appears that the soldier was dissipated and of nomadic habits, and that in 1866 he went to St. Joseph, Mo., and wrote home that he was sick, and that a neighbor, Mr. Mize, reported that Mr. Mangold had died in St. Joseph, and that he had seen him buried. This Mr. Mize is long since deceased.

The most thorough inquiry by seven special examiners developed nothing to rebut the presumption that the soldier is dead, and this inquiry equally failed to show positively the fact of his death. Twenty-nine years' unexplained absence, together with the fact that the soldier's own application has been utterly abandoned since it was filed, leaves no reasonable conclusion but that the soldier is long since dead.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass without amendment except that the name "Saloma," in the title and in line 7, should read "Saloma."

Amend title to read, "A bill granting a pension to Saloma Mangold."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear distinctly the whole of that bill when read, because I was interrupted during the reading; but I think that bills of that character have usually been amended by the committee reporting them by inserting a proviso that in the event of the soldier himself applying for a pension the pension hereby granted shall cease.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest the propriety of first disposing of the amendment recommended by the committee correcting the error in the title.

The amendment recommended in the last paragraph of the report was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I move to amend the bill by adding a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That in the event the soldier should hereafter apply for or be granted a pension this pension shall cease.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH R. BROOKS.

Mr. CURTIS of New York (when his name was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 5565) granting a pension to Joseph R. Brooks, father, by adoption, of Henry M. Brooks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph R. Brooks, father, by adoption, of Henry M. Brooks, late of Company C, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, to date from the approval of this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows: Add to the bill the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. CURTIS of New York. If the committee will allow me—

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman, before proceeding with his remarks, will allow the report to be read.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think my friend from Virginia will be amply satisfied with the statement I shall make. I furnished to the committee the material on which this report is based, and I think I can state the facts more briefly than the committee have done.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is not under oath now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am acting under my oath of office. When I stand on the floor of this House asking for any legislation I am acting under the official oath which I took when I entered upon my service in this House.

Joseph R. Brooks, about fifty years ago, adopted a child 16 months old. He was without children of his own. His wife, then his companion, died about six years ago. He has since remarried. He is now, or was when this bill was introduced a year or more ago, 75 years of age and destitute. This child, whom he educated and who was his sole dependence, went into the Army in August, 1862, and died from typhoid fever in the spring of 1863, I believe. It is in accord with the custom of this House in meritorious cases of this kind, where a child has been adopted in infancy, to grant a pension to the foster parent. I think the case needs no further explanation; but I shall be glad to answer any question which may be necessary to inform members thoroughly of the reasons why the bill should pass.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, this is an application to pension a man on account of the service of a child that he adopted.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. A child that this man adopted at the age of 16 months.

Mr. JONES. And the gentleman thinks that this foster father should be pensioned on account of the services of this child?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir; it has been done in many cases in each Congress of which I have been a member, and in many cases previously.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation; there being on a division (called for by Mr. JONES)—ayes 36, noes 1.

CAROLINE E. WESSELS.

Mr. DE FORREST (when his name was called). I call up the bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Wessels.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Caroline E. Wessels, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry W. Wessels, late of Connecticut, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "fifty," in line 7, and substitute therefor the word "thirty," so as to fix the rate of pension at $30 per month; also amend by spelling the claimant's surname "Wessels."

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2599) granting pension to Caroline E. Wessels, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

Inquiry at the Pension Bureau elicits the information that Mrs. Wessels filed a claim under the general laws, but the same was rejected on the ground of her inability to supply the evidence necessary to show that the cause of her husband's death originated in the service in the line of duty.

For the further facts in the case reference is made to Senate Report No. 816, present session, which your committee take the liberty to adopt and make a part of their report, except so much thereof as recommends a rating of $50 per month.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out the word "fifty," in line 7, and substitute therefor the word "thirty," so as to fix the rate of pension at $30 per month; also amend by spelling the claimant's surname "Wessels."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the report in this case is so brief and meager that I do not believe anybody in this House understands from it anything about this case, unless it be the gentleman who reported the bill and the gentleman who has called it up. I do not know that I ever heard a briefer report upon a bill involving so large an amount of pension as this does. It seems to me this is a case which ought to be fully explained to the House before it is acted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk states to the Chair that the Senate report which is appended to that of the House committee was not read.

Mr. JONES. I hope that will be read, as the House report does not give such information as we ought to have.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Senate Report No. 816, Fifty-third Congress, third session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Wessels, have examined the same and report:

The claimant under this bill is the widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry W. Wessels. She is about fifty-eight years of age, in very infirm health, and without any means of support.

General Wessels graduated at West Point in 1833, and from that time until he was retired at his own request, in January, 1871, was in constant and important military service. He served in the Seminole war in Florida, in the Mexican war, on the frontier in the war with the Indians, and during the war of the rebellion. He was promoted for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Cherubusco, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Fair Oaks, Va., for gallant and meritorious services during the rebel attack on Plymouth, N. C., and for gallant and meritorious services during the war, at which time he was brevetted brigadier-general. General Wessels died at Dover, Del., in January, 1889.

General Wessels's valuable services in the Mexican war were recognized by the State of Connecticut in 1849 in voting him a magnificent sword. During the latter years of his life he was a severe and continued sufferer from diseases incurred in the service, and was unable to perform any labor or to earn anything in any capacity.

The following letter from Hon. O. H. PLATT is important as bearing on the physical and financial condition of the claimant:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1895.

GENTLEMEN: I have introduced a bill giving a pension to Mrs. Caroline E. Wessels, widow of Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Gen. H. W. Wessels. In it I mention $100 a month, but I suppose $50 is all that can be claimed. The papers introduced with the bill are the same which were filed in 1891, and they correctly state the circumstances under which a pension is asked, with this exception: The widow then stated that she had an income of $800 a year from property her husband had left her. Since then, however, the investments have become valueless, and she is now entirely without income. She is sick, probably fatally so; at any rate the condition of her health is such that there is no prospect of life being protracted to any great length.

I think, in view of the pensions which have been granted, and the somewhat remarkable length of service of General Wessels, that she is entitled to a pension of this amount. I could procure affidavits as to her present condition, but I think you will take my word for it. I believe I am accurately informed.

Yours, truly,

O. H. PLATT.

The COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS, United States Senate.

Your committee, recognising the exceedingly valuable services of General Wessels, covering a period of thirty-eight years, and in view of the sickness and destitution of the widow, recommend the passage of the bill, after being amended by striking out the words "one hundred," in line 7, and substituting the word "fifty."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The question being taken on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported favorably to the House, there were—ayes 27, noes 3.

Mr. JONES. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JONES and Mr. DE FOREST were appointed.

Mr. DE FOREST (after a pause). I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] does not insist on his point.

Mr. JONES. In view of an understanding which I have with the gentleman, I withdraw the point.

So the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALBERT MUNSON.

Mr. DOLLIVER (when his name was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 6646) for the relief of Albert Munson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Albert Munson, imbecile son of Jacob H. Munson, late a member of Company I, First Regiment Iowa Cavalry.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the words, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the act of June 27, 1890."

The report (by Mr. LACY) was read, as follows:

Jacob H. Munson was a private in Company I, First Iowa Cavalry, and was pensioned under general laws and afterwards under act of 1890.

Albert H. Munson is an imbecile and helpless son, now about 33 years of age. As he was over sixteen years of age at the time of the passage of the act of 1890, and as his father died after the passage of that act, the said son does not become entitled to the benefits of the act, under the construction of the law as laid down by the Pension Bureau. A subsequent ruling of the Secretary of the Interior includes many of these cases of imbecile children, but not cases like the present.

The spirit of the law was intended to give relief to imbecile children of soldiers of the late war, and in this case we think that the claimant should receive the benefit of the pension by a special act.

Evidence of Emma Dixon and Harry Laub shows that said Albert became an imbecile at the age of 2½ years, and that he is now helpless and dependent and was supported by his father up to the time of his father's death.

His father served from December 23, 1863, to February 15, 1866, and his pension was increased to $12 under the act of June 27, 1890, at time of his death. His certificate was numbered 295382.

Representative J. F. DOLLIVER certifies to the death of the soldier and also to the death of the soldier's wife, mother of said Albert Munson.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass, after being amended by adding the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," at the close of the bill.

Also, amend the title to read: "A bill to pension Albert Munson."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be some statement from the gentleman in charge of this bill as to the extent of the imbecility of this claimant. "Imbecility" is a pretty general term; it covers a good many people. [Laughter.] I frequently see it stated in the public press that a good many of us are classed as imbeciles. I do not think, however, that we ought to be put on the pension rolls on that account, though probably the charge is not without foundation in fact.

I hope the gentleman will state to what extent this imbecility goes, for I know a good many people, in all seriousness, classed as imbeciles who are able to earn their own livelihood, and are capable of exerting sufficient intelligence to get along fairly well in the world.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This is an authentic case. The claimant is in the asylum provided for imbecile children in Iowa, and supported by his sister, who lives in Denison.

Mr. JONES. I understand the gentleman to say that the beneficiary of this bill is in some asylum?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes; for feeble-minded children.

Mr. JONES. And supported by his sister?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. Then I understand that he is not a charge on the State, but is sustained by his family?

Mr. DOLLIVER. His sister is entirely unable to contribute to his support, but has done it from the circumstances of the case.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman know that his sister is not in a condition to furnish this support?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do. I know the family quite well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER WILLIAMSON.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Chairman, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8099) to increase the pension of Alexander Williamson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the present pension paid to Alexander Williamson, a private in Company H, Second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, during the war with Mexico, be, and is hereby, increased to $50 per month, and the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, directed to have his name placed on the pension roll at such increased pension.

Mr. DURBOROW. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 8099, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

Alexander Williamson was a soldier of Company H, Second Kentucky Volunteers, and served from May 22, 1846, to June 10, 1847, in the war with Mexico. He was pensioned on account of the above service at $8 per month under the act of January 29, 1887, and this was subsequently increased to $12 per month under the act of January 5, 1893, upon his proving destitution and inability to earn his support by manual labor.

Mr. Williamson is 70 years old, and besides being badly broken down by age and the ailments incident thereto, has recently been stricken with severe blindness, so much so that he has to be led about. The facts are shown by the papers at the Pension Bureau and by the statement of distinguished citizens, including physicians, in the city of Lexington, Ky., where the claimant resides.

The facts presented above present an exceptional case, sufficient, in the judgment of your committee, to warrant Congress in granting a measure of relief. The bill is therefore returned with a favorable recommendation; amended, however, by striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five," so as to fix the rate of pension at $25 per month. Also amended by striking out "Commissioner of Pensions," in line 6, and substituting therefor "Secretary of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I gather from the reading of the report that this applicant resides in Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he introduced the bill himself?

Mr. DURBOROW. Is that necessary? [Laughter.] I think it is a very meritorious case, if that is what the gentleman wants to know.

Mr. JONES. It may be a very meritorious case, but we are proceeding under an order which we can not avoid. I certainly hope that the gentleman will not be permitted—

Mr. MOSES. Let me state to the gentleman from Virginia that the introducer of this bill came up here to-night, but did not reach the Hall until just after his name had been called.

Mr. DURBOROW. If the gentleman from Georgia will pardon me, I was going to submit to the gentleman from Virginia that I came here to-night expecting to call up a bill of my own, the bill (H. R. 6771) to remove the charge of desertion against the name of James E. Cotter, but found that the bill had not been reported from the committee, as I expected it would be, and was not proper to be called up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to hold that the objection comes too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about the bill.

I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw it. My attention was directed to the fact that the gentleman might not have introduced this bill, not only because the proposed beneficiary resides in Kentucky, but also from the fact that the bill only asked for a rating of $50 a month. I felt sure that a gentleman representing the great city of Chicago would never be able to obtain his own consent to ask for such a small sum as $50 per month. I was persuaded that no citizen of Chicago would consent to receive such a pittance as that.

Now, the report states that this Mexican soldier is in absolutely destitute circumstances and unable to earn a livelihood.

Mr. DURBOROW. He is blind.

Mr. JONES. I do not know nor do I care whether that total inability to earn a livelihood comes from blindness or any other cause. The general law in force before the passage of the act of 1893 provided that the Mexican soldiers should have a pension of $8 a month. Then it was asserted in Congress that there were many of these soldiers who were very old and were in absolutely destitute circumstances and totally unable to earn a livelihood. In deference to that state of facts a law was passed providing that all those Mexican soldiers who came within that category—and this man comes within it—should have $12 a month given to them if they could establish their claim.

Now, it seems to me that when this has been adopted as a general policy, that this soldier should not have more than the $12 a month allowed others who are just as needy and just as destitute as himself. The law was broadened and extended for the purpose of taking in a person of just this sort; and now the law having been passed as late as 1893, and this man having applied under the law and had his pension increased to $12 a month, he should not be permitted to have that pension doubled.

Why, if he has the increase every other Mexican soldier who stands in the same position, and is absolutely in destitute circumstances and unable to earn a livelihood, should be given this same increase of $25 a month. Congress did not propose to be that generous. In all these cases, as gentlemen must recognize, these old Mexican soldiers can not possibly live on $12 a month, and I admit that this man probably can not live on $12 a month; but why give him $25 a month, when all others who are in precisely the same circumstances have only $12 a month?

Mr. DOKERY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that under the general law applicable to soldiers of the late war a blind soldier would be entitled to $72 a month.

Mr. JONES. But this is a soldier of the Mexican war.

Mr. MOSES. Are you not willing to give a soldier of the Mexican war who is blind the same amount as would be received by a soldier of the late war? The reason he can not get $72 a month is simply because he did not serve in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. JONES. I will say in answer to the gentleman that if it was presented to me as an original and general proposition I would be willing to put soldiers of the Mexican war upon the same footing as the soldiers of the late war; but Congress has decided by general legislation that they should not be put upon that footing. Besides, this soldier, if in the late war, could not receive $72 per month unless his blindness was the result of his services.

Mr. MOSES. If we are to have only general legislation, what is the use of these Friday night sessions?

Mr. JONES. All should stand upon the same footing who belong to the same class.

Mr. MOSES. What is the use of passing any special bills if you are going to insist upon a general law?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I had not intended to speak this evening, and I only wish to say a few words. I want first to thank my friend from Chicago [Mr. DURBOROW] for giving this poor soldier a chance to have his case considered. Second, I want to make this explanation: The difference between this Mexican soldier and other soldiers of the Mexican war is simply the difference between total blindness and that general inability to make a livelihood that comes from old age and ordinary disabilities.

This is a rather remarkable case. This man was unable to make a living and did obtain his $12 a month under the law of 1893. Subsequently he was struck with total blindness. It is proved in the record and it is one of the most remarkable cases that I know of. His ill health was largely the result of exposure during the Mexican war, but he attempted in his old age to continue to make a living by writing. He was a subeditor of a paper in my district, not in my town, and contrived to make something toward a living by his pen. The doctors think that by overworking his eyes, in his already enfeebled condition as the result of his exposure during the Mexican war, in that effort he became suddenly blind. If he had been a soldier in the late war he would have been entitled to $72 a month. This is simply an exceptional case.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the gentleman if he could receive $72 a month unless it was shown that his blindness resulted from his service in the army? The gentleman does not claim that this man's blindness resulted from his service in the Mexican war, I presume?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. On the contrary, the judgment of those who know him is that it was that very thing. He has been suffering from diseased eyes since he came back from Mexico. He has been a constant sufferer from weak eyes since the Mexican exposure. He was then a young man, in the prime of life, and he came back with impaired vision. He is now about seventy years old, and he has been making a serious struggle all his life to get a living by his pen. His impaired eyesight has gradually grown worse and worse, until at one stroke he was made blind, and he now has to be led around the streets.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN B. LEACH.

Mr. EVERETT (when his name was called). Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 2118) for the relief of John B. Leach.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls the name of John B. Leach, father of John R. Leach, who was formerly a member of Company A, Fifty-ninth New York Infantry, and to pay him the pension of a dependent father from the passage of this act.

Mr. EVERETT. I should like to have the report read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. McETRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 2118) granting a pension to John B. Leach, and submit the following report:

The petitioner is the father of John B. Leach, who served in Company A, Fifty-ninth New York Infantry, from December 31, 1861, until killed in battle at Antietam, September 17, 1862. This soldier left a widow, who was pensioned until November 13, 1867, when she married one Thomas Brown, and her pension then ceased by operation of law. The father's claim is rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the soldier left a widow, and in such case neither mother nor father has any title under the general laws. Letters and copies of letters on file state that the father is a worthy citizen, with no source of income, aged and feeble, being 78 years of age; that he fell and broke his hip in December last, and is dependent on charity for his care in a hospital.

A letter on file from Hon. WILLIAM EVERETT states that he is informed that the mother of the soldier is deceased.
Your committee recommend that the bill do pass, and that the title be amended to read: "A bill to pension John B. Leach."

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a very few words in explanation of this case. That it is outside of the law is admitted; so that if the committee grant the pension it can only be an exception. The soldier was killed in the battle of Antietam. His widow received a widow's pension, and then by remarriage she lost that pension. The mother of the soldier is dead. I have with me a certified copy of the record of her death. His father is now a man of 76 years of age, I think, very infirm, and dependent upon charity. Lately he has had a serious accident, for which he has received charitable treatment in hospital.

The petition is that the widow's pension having been forfeited, and the mother being dead, the father shall now receive a pension as dependent father from the passage of this act. There is no pretense that it comes under any law. It is a peculiar case of itself, and I have no wish to detain the committee at any length in pressing it in any exceptional way, but hope it will be judged on its merits.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, this is certainly a peculiar case. I do not think there can be a precedent shown for a case of exactly this kind.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. JONES. I know what the gentleman from Indiana intends to say. We have given pensions to mothers and probably to fathers and sometimes to the invalid children of soldiers whose widows have remarried. This is an exceptional case in that this man is simply an old man, some 76 years of age.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Seventy-eight.

Mr. JONES. I understood the gentleman to say about 76 years of age. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to pension the fathers and the mothers of soldiers whose widows have remarried and thereby lost their pensions, unless it is a case of absolute destitution, unless it is a case that appeals to this House much stronger than this one does, we might as well repension all those widows who are applying here to have their pensions restored.

Mr. EVERETT. This is the father of the soldier. The widow has remarried and she is outside.

Mr. JONES. I understand perfectly, Mr. Chairman, that this is the father of the soldier; but the father of a soldier can not obtain a pension so long as the woman who was the wife of the soldier is living. She had a pension herself.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Only after her death.

Mr. JONES. And, as the chairman of the committee suggests to me, only after her death.

Mr. EVERETT. That is admitted.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, that being true, I would like to know what there is in this case that makes it stronger than thousands of cases that might be brought here. It simply happens that this man has a friend in the eloquent and distinguished gentleman who represents the State of Massachusetts in part upon this floor, and he is enabled to get his case before Congress when hundreds and thousands of other people who stand in exactly the same position as he does can not get a hearing here, or do not get a hearing here, and are not given the same consideration that this man is asked to be given. It has not been the policy of this Government by general law to pension men who stand in his position; and it seems to me it is wrong, simply because this man is 76 years of age, to pass a special act to give him a pension when there is no reason why he should obtain it, and he can not obtain it under any general law.

The law gave a pension to the widow of the dead soldier, but she has relinquished it by remarrying. She has lost it. Now, here is an effort to take this pension which this woman has relinquished and lost and bestow it upon the father of the soldier. I submit that if this is done in this case that it merely amounts to a nullification of the law which deprives remarried widows of their pensions.

I do not think that this Congress, by these special acts, ought to attempt to avoid that general law in this way; and I hope that Congress will not establish this bad precedent. I know that this single case will not greatly swell the enormous pension roll that we have, but it will be establishing a bad precedent, and one that will be referred to here one week from to-day in an effort to secure a pension for some other soldier's father. If not in a week from to-day, there will be hundreds of bills introduced hereafter for the same purpose, on the ground that Congress has seen fit to grant a pension in this particular case. It just opens the door to putting a large number of these people upon the pension roll. If it is done after proper consideration, and it is determined to be the policy of Congress to do this, I do not see how we can refuse to do the same thing with other people who come here pressing cases of the same sort; and therefore I hope this bill will be defeated.

The question was taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 6.

So the bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BRETZ, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report the same to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bills reported this evening from the Committee of the Whole to the House, with the right of debate for fifteen minutes on each side, and with the right of way reserved to appropriation and revenue bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 4233) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Cumberland, Md.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, certain information as to what kinds of money or currency and what amount of each kind have been received in exchange for the United States bonds issued and sold under the provisions of the refunding act of 1870; which, on motion of Mr. PLATT, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

OKLAHOMA CENTRAL RAILROAD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. BLANCHARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the bill (H. R. 5624) to authorize the Oklahoma Central Railroad to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes, and the amendments of the Senate thereto.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. President, there is upon your table a House bill, the bill (H. R. 8724) to provide for the striking of juries in the District of Columbia. I ask the Chair to lay that bill before the Senate that I may request the Senate to put it upon its passage, as the Committee on the District of Columbia has reported, and there is now on the Calendar, a bill exactly similar to the one passed by the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HALE. Upon what order of business are we proceeding?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. HALE. The rule is very plain that in the call of routine business certain things shall be done in order. The first is the presentation and reception of petitions and memorials. The next is reports of committees. The next is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions; and after that Senate resolutions. That is what is called the routine morning business. I insist here and now, and whenever I am here I shall insist, that the routine business be proceeded with, and that nothing else shall be attended to until that is through. I think I may venture to suggest that if the Chair will enforce that order and state that the time for making requests for the consideration of measures on the Calendar has not been reached, but that the routine business comes first, much confusion will be avoided. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time, and ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair follows the precedents. Where a request is made by a Senator for unanimous consent the Chair submits the request to the Senate. Objection is interposed to the request of the Senator from Virginia. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the New York Chamber of Commerce and a petition of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, praying for the reorganization of the consular and diplomatic service; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Wright and 71 other citizens of Choctaw County, making the same representations and stating the same prayer. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of the State of Wyoming, relative to the issuance of gold and other bonds, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

House joint resolution No. 7.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That, believing that the proposed additional issue of bonds on the part of the National Government is a movement in the East on the part of New York bankers to force the country to a gold basis, beyond the possibility of a change, and to drive the National Government from its constitutional supervision of the currency of the country, and believing that this would entail untold misery on the common people of the land, we most respectfully ask that the representatives in the National Congress from the State of Wyoming protest against the issuance of gold bonds or any bonds which would fasten a debt upon the people for generations to come.

We further ask that the representatives of this State use all honorable means to prevent legislation as proposed by the President's message sent to Congress on Monday, January 21, 1895, and to defeat the Administration bill now before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives in Washington.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably indorsed and engrossed, be sent to Hon. J. M. CAREY and Hon. C. D. CLARK, in the Senate of the United States, and Hon. H. A. COFFEY, in the House of Representatives.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,

Approved February 11, A. D. 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the legislative assembly of Arizona; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

House memorial No. 4.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the eighteenth legislative assembly of Arizona, beg leave to represent to your honorable bodies:

First. That there is in the northern part of this Territory, lying within the borders of Apache County, near the town of Holbrook, a wonderful deposit of petrified wood, commonly called the "Petrified Forest" or "Chalcedony Park."

This deposit or forest is unequalled for its extent, the size of the trees, and the beauty and great variety of coloring found in the logs.

A country 10 miles square is covered by the trunks of trees, some of which measure over 200 feet in length and from 7 to 10 feet in diameter.

Ruthless curiosity seekers are destroying these huge trees and logs by blasting them in pieces in search of crystals, which are found in the center of many of them, while car loads of the limbs and smaller pieces are being shipped away to be ground up for various purposes.

Second. Believing that this wonderful deposit should be kept inviolate that future generations may enjoy its beauties and study one of the most curious and interesting effects of nature's forces:

We, your memorialists, most respectfully request that the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to withdraw from entry all public lands covered by this forest until a commission or officer appointed by your honorable bodies may investigate and report to you upon the advisability of taking this forest under the charge of the General Government and making a national park or reservation of it.

It is annually visited now by hundreds of scientific men and travelers from every State and country, and some such action by your bodies would preserve it from the vandalism it is now subjected to.

We would further state that at present there is no person living within the limits of the proposed park, so that no settlers will be disturbed by any such action on your part.

And be it resolved by the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, That our Delegate in Congress be, and is hereby, instructed to use all honorable means to have some action taken by Congress to have this Chalcedony Park set aside and formed into a national park under the care and charge of the General Government.

Also that the secretary of the Territory be, and is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of this memorial to each House of Congress, our Delegate to Congress, and the United States Land Commissioner.

BIMETALLISM AND GOLD BONDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. HILL on the 11th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved (if the House of Representatives concurs), That it is the sense of Congress that the true policy of the Government requires that its efforts should be steadily directed to the establishment of a safe system of bimetalism, wherein gold and silver may be maintained at a parity, and every dollar coined may be the equal in value and power of every other dollar coined or issued by the United States; but if our efforts to establish or maintain such bimetalism shall not be wholly successful, and if for any reason our silver coin shall not hereafter be at parity with gold coin and the equal thereof in value and power in the market and in the payment of debts; then it is hereby declared that the bonds of the United States now or hereafter issued which by their terms are payable in coin, shall nevertheless be paid in standard gold dollars, it being the policy of the United States that its creditors shall at all times be paid in the best money in use.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. HALE. Let us have it again read.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask if the resolution is not susceptible of a division?

Mr. HILL. I think so. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] wishes to offer a substitute, after which I desire to say something.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will offer as a substitute what I send to the desk. It does not, I believe, depart essentially in principle from the resolution just read, but it is much shorter and much clearer, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the established policy of the United States to maintain gold and silver coins at a parity according to their coinage ratio, so that every dollar coined may be the equal in value of every other dollar coined or issued by the United States; but if at any time our silver coin shall not be at a parity with gold coin according to their coinage ratio, then the bonds of the United States now or hereafter issued which by their terms are payable in coin shall be paid in standard gold coin.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move the reference of both the resolution and the substitute to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I second the motion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words in support of this resolution. From its very nature it strikes me that it ought to be approved by every member of this body. I do not regard that it enunciates any particular new principle. I say it ought to be approved by every Senator here unless there sits around this circle a gold monometallist or a silver monometallist. I have very few words to address to those gentlemen, but assuming that nearly every Senator here is a bimetalist in the proper sense of the term, I think this resolution embodies his ideas.

It is a safe, a conservative, and an appropriate resolution at this time. In the first place, conceding its divisibility, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], it announces the true policy of the Government, which is, in a word, that our efforts should be steadily directed toward the establishment of the policy of bimetalism.

Mr. President, I need not remind both political parties here that that is what they profess; I am not here to suggest that the two principal political parties of the country are not honest in those statements contained in their platforms in favor of bimetalism. In addition to that fact, the policy of bimetalism, not in favor of gold alone, not in favor simply of silver alone, but in favor of both metals, has been solemnly declared by both political parties.

I recall to the attention of the Senate and the country the bill which passed this Congress on the 1st of November, 1893, a bill to stop the purchase of silver bullion, which bill repealed made silver merely a commodity and declared, in the very terms of the repeal, that it was the duty of this Government to steadily pursue steps toward the maintenance of bimetalism. That bill received the approval of the House of Representatives; it received the approval of the Senate. Senators and Representatives voted for it who were advocates of the free coinage of silver, because that repeal itself was believed to be one of the true steps toward the maintenance or the establishment of a system of bimetalism. I recollect distinctly that in the few remarks which I had the honor of submitting in favor of the passage of that measure I called attention to the importance of that declaration. It is true it stopped the limited, restricted, and the illogical coinage of silver; but I called the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that there was contained in it a most solemn pledge of vast importance to the financial interests of the country. I need not read it. It forms a part of the statutes of the country. It declares the policy of the Government to be that of the pursuit of steady steps toward the maintenance or the establishment of the policy of bimetalism.

Mr. President, that portion of this resolution ought to receive the votes of every Senator for the reasons which I have urged. I make no appeal to Senators who believe in the single standard of gold or the single standard of silver. They are committed to their ways, and they should vote against the first part of this resolution. But I do make an appeal to the true friends of both silver and gold, the men who desire the double standard. To those who contend that it is impossible to maintain such double standard in this country I have nothing to say. I believe it is possible to maintain it. It perhaps can not be maintained at all times or at all hours with exact precision. It will take preparation, it will require revised laws, it will require a friendly Administration. It must be administered in its true spirit and carried out in its true purpose.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has introduced a substitute, which is a slight modification, as I understand it from a hasty reading of it, which differs from my resolution in a few words. My resolution declares—

That it is the sense of Congress that the true policy of the Government requires that its efforts should be steadily directed to the establishment of a safe system of bimetalism.

I think that language is preferable to the language of the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio declares in his resolution that it is the established policy of the Government, as though there was no question that it was an already established policy. That leads to differences of opinion.

I am inclined to think that some steps are necessary; I am inclined to think that the propositions which have been made lately, which it is not necessary now to refer to at length, are rather in the opposite direction. When you make discrimination between your coin, then I fear that you are taking a step in the wrong direction; and therefore I think it is wiser that we adhere to the terms of my resolution, which avoids any question as to the propriety of what is now being proposed, but simply directs our eyes to the future as to what we ought to do.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to be interrupted now.

Mr. STEWART. I should like simply to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HILL. At the close of my remarks there will be time to debate the resolution.

Mr. President, I prefer to avoid all details of policy at this time. I think it is wiser to simply declare at this particular time, in this financial crisis, what the true policy of the Government should be. This resolution does not express an opinion upon the question of the propriety of issuing gold bonds, or upon the question of the propriety of issuing coin bonds; it does not express an opinion that we must, in order to maintain bimetalism, open our mints immediately, without preparation and without other changes, to the free coinage of silver. It carefully avoids those questions.

In the first place, I think it of the most supreme importance at this hour that we should inform the country and inform the world as well that our policy is not to maintain the single standard of gold nor the single standard of silver, but that, in view of what is being suggested, in view of what is being pressed, it is wise for us to make this emphatic, brief, and appropriate declaration.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. I should prefer the Senator would wait until I get through.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say now upon the first branch of the resolution. If I should speak for hours, in my judgment I could not make it more plain than I have.

I now come to the second part of the resolution. Having said that our true policy is bimetalism, which means that silver and gold shall be maintained at a parity, which means that this Government reserves the absolute, legal, technical right to pay its debts in the authorized coin of the country—that is true bimetalism, the maintenance of the gold standard and the maintenance of the silver standard; in other words, the maintenance of the double standard—if it should turn out that by reason of financial conditions, if it should turn out that by reason of disputes between the two Houses of Congress, if it should turn out by reason of differences of opinion as to policy between the President and Congress we may not be able to fully establish or at least to fully maintain this policy, what then suggests itself?

How shall we pay our bonded debts or our other debts? I think that at this hour this is an important declaration to make, that we believe in the double standard, that we believe in the use of both gold and silver alike. We reserve the absolute right to pay our bonded and other debts in either coin, but if it shall occur that there is any difference between the two, then we announce not by statute, but we pledge the faith of the Government, as a matter of policy, that we will pay in the best coin in use.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest the other day to the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. He substantially committed himself to this theory. He advocated more than that, it is true; he advocated other and different things about which I do not propose to speak, but he substantially committed himself to the principle that he did not want to pay the bonds of this country in depreciated silver; he did not want to degrade the currency of the country; he wanted both gold and silver, and he wanted to maintain them both if we could; but he also said at the same time that the Government should pay always in the best money in use. That is all I ask in this resolution that we shall pay.

I hope, sir, that there will never occur a time when it will be necessary for us to pause and consider the question whether we shall pay silver or gold; I trust we can maintain this policy of bimetalism, so that creditors will be substantially indifferent as to which shall be offered to them. I believe that it is a wise policy to retain within the power of the Government the right to pay in both metals, the technical, the strict, the legal right; but if for any reason it should be impossible in any emergency to do that, impossible to maintain absolute parity, if by reason of raids upon the Treasury, if by reason of combinations of capital at home or abroad, if by reason of any great commercial crisis that may come, there should be a well-recognized discrimination between the value of those two coins, then I say that the good faith of this Government is pledged not by statute, but by resolution that we shall pay in the best coin in use. That, in brief, is just what this resolution declares that we should do.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HILL. I can see no answer to this. So far as I am concerned, it seems to me it ought to receive the approval of the friends of gold, of the friends of silver, and that it ought certainly to receive the approval of the friends of bimetalism.

What is the contrary of the proposition? Is it proposed to pay in a depreciated currency? Do you propose to foist depreciated silver coin upon the creditors of your country if there should be a recognized difference between the two metals?

Mr. President, it may be said that it is unwise to recognize the possibility of failure to maintain bimetalism. That is one criticism, it is true. It may be said we ought not to assume the possibility of an inability to maintain the two coins at a parity in this country of ours. Then, I submit, no harm is done. We can not, however, be blind to the signs of the times. If the Government shall imitate the example which is now being set by private parties, loaning money and making a discrimination in the coin in which debts shall be paid, it is likely and possible that in a very short time gold may be at a premium by reason of causes not now necessary to be discussed. If that be so, where is the Senator who insists upon it that we should not pay in the best money that there is in use? We should not confine ourselves technically and strictly to the precise language of the act itself, but we should maintain the credit and the honor of this Government, and, in the language of the Senator from Colorado, pay in the best money in use. All sides can agree to this. It does not involve any question as to whether the bonds shall be payable in gold or silver; it does not involve any question of the opening of your mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. It avoids those questions. It is a safe and conservative and pertinent resolution at this particular time when we are drifting apart.

Mr. President, we are further apart, I fear, than we were six weeks or two months ago. The suggestion of a gold bond upon one side is answered by the free coinage of silver on the other. The proposition to retire the greenbacks is lost sight of. The real point involved, as I think, the duty which confronts us, is the retirement of the greenbacks. There is the danger, there is the drain upon the gold of our country; but that, it seems, it is impossible to do. We can at least take this step: we can at least assure the people of this country and we can assure those from whom we are borrowing money in other countries that, although we are so tied up by disagreements that we can not pass the bills which are introduced, we can at least say to them, "Take our coin bonds, and we will pay them in the best currency in the world, if there is any difference between currencies."

Need we be blind to the fact that in a few short months more bonds of some kind or character must be issued? Let us keep down the interest on those bonds. This resolution will help to do it. We gain nothing by trying to wreck the Government. Neither political party accomplishes anything by bringing on a financial panic in the summer months and compelling us again to come here to resume the consideration of this question.

Mr. HOAR crossed the aisle and made a suggestion to Mr. HILL. Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope we may be permitted to hear the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. What is the suggestion of the Senator?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask if we can hear the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing to be concealed about it. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that in 1869 the question as to how the bonds of the country should be paid was determined by a joint resolution of Congress; and it is a very pertinent suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York yield to me a moment.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I thought instead of publicly interrupting the Senator from New York it would be better for me to make this suggestion to him as I did, that the same policy which is proposed now is the policy which solved the question of the payment of the debt and hired money in 1869 simply by a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress. A rather angry reply to my honorable friend from Colorado rose to my lips on hearing the suggestion made by him, but I am so sure of the good feeling and generally courteous nature of that Senator, that I will take it for granted that he would not desire to say anything offensive to me.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that it was only in the best of good feeling and good faith that I asked that we should be permitted to hear the colloquy, because I did not suppose it was private. I supposed it had to do with something in the remarks of the Senator from New York, to which I felt I might be called upon to make some reply, however inefficient and feeble, and I made the request in order that we might have the benefit of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I knew would be good as compared with the remarks of the Senator from New York, which I hope will be good. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I hope, Mr. President, that my suggestions will be at least as good as some of the currency that is advocated by some members of the Senate. [Laughter.]

I had hoped that this Congress might do more than this. I had hoped that we might by common consent enter upon a discussion of this financial question and proceed to relieve the country.

I repeat here what I said a few moments ago, that I think it is the imperative duty of Congress to proceed to take steps to retire the greenback currency. Need I argue before this Senate that the existence of such greenbacks is one of the principal difficulties which now confronts us? Need I remind you that it is because of the existence of this greenback currency that the gold is taken out of the Treasury?

I quote what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said:

Mr. President, that the greenback is an active agency to take gold out of the Treasury, I do not deny. I do not deny that if you should retire the greenbacks, if you should take them to the furnace and burn them, and should follow that by the destruction of $150,000,000 in round numbers of Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890, the exporter would find no way of getting gold out of the Treasury.

That is the step we ought to take, that is the step that I regret to say it seems impossible to take by reason of differences here, differences in the other House, and possibly differences in both Houses with the President. But if that can not be done I had hoped that our friends, the true bimetalists, sometimes called the silver Senators, would see that the elimination of the greenback currency was a step in their interests; that they would see that in the place of the greenbacks and the contraction thereby occasioned, there would necessarily be a public demand for other currency.

I think Senators stand in their own light when they refuse legislation destroying and eliminating greenbacks and taking them out of our currency. But that seems to be the course to be pursued. No legislation, it is said, can reasonably be expected upon that line. Then, Mr. President, awaiting, as we are, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether any immediate relief to supply existing deficiencies is needed or not—of course we shall not legislate upon that question until we hear from the Secretary of the Treasury—if we can not pass upon that question we can at least do these two things, declare that this Congress is not committed to gold, declare that this Congress is not committed to silver alone, but declare by an emphatic vote that we stand where we stood when we repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman silver law in 1893; that we stand here for bimetalism, ready to redeem the pledges which we gave in that session, and that we shall take any step necessary toward the maintenance of this principle. We further declare if our efforts shall fail, if by reason of any of these conditions there does arise a difference between the value of our gold and silver, as patriotic men, responsible for the conduct of this Government, we declare to the country and to the world that we will pay in the best money in use.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised at the remarks of the Senator from New York in view of his insistence during the last few weeks that our time should be spent in pertinent discussion, in the discussion of measures which had some chance of being deliberated and voted upon. No Senator is more aware than is the Senator from New York that he is thrashing old straw.

The House of Representatives on yesterday forever disposed, so far as this session is concerned, of the subject of the indorsement of gold bonds. Notwithstanding the frantic efforts of an Administration with all its power and its patronage, notwithstanding the efforts of the leaders of both political parties, the House of Representatives by a decisive vote refused to sanction the policy outlined and approved by the proposed resolution of the Senator from New York.

The Senator is equally out of date, Mr. President, in his reference to the legislation of the special session which dealt with the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. He speaks of the bimetalists who voted for repeal as if he would class himself as one.

Mr. President, there was no genuine bimetalist who voted for repeal, unless it be two or three Senators who voted in the belief and in the shadowy hope that the promises which the Administration gave would be carried out, and who sincerely trusted in the declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury that the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act would be followed with some fuller measure for the recognition of silver, but the Senator from New York was not one of them. There were some Senators who voted for repeal upon that declared assurance; and I think I violate no confidence when I state that no one of those Senators, in view of the disastrous occurrences of the last year and a half, if it were to be done again, would ever vote for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, bad as that act was in principle and in practice.

But, Mr. President, the class of bimetalists to which the Senator from New York belongs is the bimetalist upon a gold basis. He wants the use of the two metals, and he wants them measured by the value of gold. He does not want them measured with the double standard or with the equal representation at the ratio declared by law. He is a bimetalist, because he is a gold monometallist, and, measured by gold, he is willing that silver shall be used to a limited extent instead of paper.

Mr. President, it is a poor time to introduce a resolution calling upon this country to indorse a gold bond. The President's wanton attack upon the credit of the United States has been the most disastrous occurrence of this generation, the most significantly wanton and cruel and deliberate attack upon the credit of our country that could be inflicted upon it.

But a few weeks before, when $50,000,000 of bonds were offered at 3 per cent, $185,000,000 in the United States alone was subscribed for them on that basis. Following that fact, with the knowledge that there were $135,000,000 waiting here to invest in our bonds, payable in lawful money at 3 per cent, the President of the United States entered into a secret negotiation with the Rothschilds of Europe, whereby he proposed to give them a long bond at an excessive rate, so that he could make an apparent showing to the discredit of our country and its finances. But before the bonds are even issued the reaction has come. The subscribers to that syndicate are called upon to pay only 10 per cent of their subscriptions, and the balance they will never be called upon to pay. The syndicate are already offered for the bonds 112½. There have been, and I have eminent authority for the statement, in the city of New York alone more than $130,000,000 tendered to the syndicate for the bonds at 112½. I have the authority of the president of one of the leading banks of New York that within the next sixty days the price of those bonds will rise to 120.

Mr. President, if there ever were bonds which ought to be paid in silver or depreciated money, if it could be found, it is this issue of bonds which the syndicate has purchased notoriously at less than their worth and included in their contract a statement of their estimate of the difference in value between gold and "lawful money." When they look the American people in the face and say to them, "If you will pay your bonds in gold we will take them at 3 per cent; if you will pay them in the worst you have we will pay you 104.49 for your bonds that shall net us 84 per cent," I say if there ever were a people who are not entitled to consideration it is the Rothschilds of Europe and the President of the United States, who has sought to blacken our credit.

Mr. President, the resolution is not divisible. It is the same preface that came in the proclamation which called us together in special session. It is the same preface which called our attention at the opening of this session to the necessity of legislation. It is the universal preface of the man who is seeking to discredit silver by prefixing the statement that we ought to maintain the coins at a parity and follows it by an endeavor to induce us to legislate one out of existence and to put the other at a premium.

The people who stand for the coinage of silver do not stand for it because they are unpatriotic. They do not stand for it because they come from the section where silver is produced. They stand for it because they believe the suffering and the poverty which are now going on the whole world over must continue until the world sees that until silver as well as gold is restored as a standard of value there can be no prosperity. You will have no prosperous railroads with wheat at 50 cents. You will have wheat at 50 cents or less as long as you have India to compete with. You will have no prosperity in this country while you have gold as its standard and an insufficient supply of it. You will have prosperity only when throughout the world there is a recognition that silver is a metal as sacred as is gold. The world is moving. Today's paper contains a significant discussion in the Reichstag, in Berlin, wherein Count Bismarck declared that the policy of the German Government should be for the bimetalism of silver, and referred significantly to the fact that the leader of the Conservatives in the House of Commons is likewise a bimetalist. We are marching toward it, but if any act on earth could destroy the possibility of international bimetalism it has been the conduct of the President of the United States in his foreign dicker and trade with the house of Rothschild. But it brings its recompense, for if there is anything that will arouse the American people to the belief that we alone can undertake the management of our finances without the help of foreign bankers it will be that same disgraceful and dishonorable contract, the terms of which are degrading to American manhood.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the substantive part of this resolution is contained in the last clause, which I understand to be a declaration on the part of the Senate, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives is invited, that our existing bonds and all bonds are payable in the best money that may be demanded by the holder. I do not desire to enter into the mooted question of who is a bimetalist or who is not a bimetalist. I myself believe in bimetalism, international bimetalism, which I know the friends of silver are disposed to laugh down.

But that is not the point. Neither is the point of the resolution the question of maintaining the parity between the dollars. That is already embodied in the law of the United States. The point of the resolution is that every obligation of the United States, where coin is nominated in the bond, is payable in the best money, yes, in gold, if the holder so demands. That is the position which has always been held by the party to which I belong. We have always held that "coin" meant gold, and declined to recognize any distinction. It has been the express declaration of the Congress of the United States.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] says our credit has been assailed by the President of the United States. It has never been more grievously assailed than by his attacks on the character of our coin bonds. It is for that reason above all others that I wish to see Congress say to the world that the obligations of the United States are payable in the best money, no matter what that money may be, payable in whatever its creditors may demand. I know that the contract to which the Senator from Colorado refers has done more injury than can be estimated to what I believe to be the cause of sound finance. It is on its face the blackest public contract ever made by the Government of the United States. But those very facts, that our credit has been assailed by the President, that such a contract has been made with a syndicate of bankers, giving them an undue and gigantic profit, seem to me only to make it more imperative that the Congress of the United States should say, in language which can not be misunderstood, that every one of its coin obligations, whether bonds or demand notes, is payable as they were understood to be issued, in gold or silver at the option of the holder; that is, in the best money, in gold, if it should be demanded. That, sir, is simple honesty.

It is not a question here of one or another system of currency, of bimetalism or monometallism. It is a question of the credit and good name of the United States. That credit has been attacked, that credit has been impaired by the very men who should have guarded it most sacredly. Imputations have been thrown upon our coin bonds and our demand notes, and I say if there ever was a time when we should follow the example of the act of 1889 we should do it now, and state to all the world that the United States stands prepared to pay every coin obligation in the best money, in gold, in whatever the creditor of the United States may demand.

I hope we may have a vote in the Senate on this question. It involves the credit of the country. I should be glad to see a vote on the financial measures also. I should like to see the Senate, with or without debate, vote its opinion as to what our currency policy shall be. If there is a free-silver majority in the Senate the country has a right to know it. If there is a majority here against free silver the country has a right to know it. I think the expression of the opinion of the Senate of the United States on those questions is desirable, but the first thing above and beyond all others, it seems to me, is to say in the strongest terms that no matter what contracts the President may make, no matter what aspersions he may throw upon our coin obligations, the United States stands prepared to pay gold on every obligation that it has out, whether the demand be a note in the form of a greenback or a time bond. This is a question above party and above politics. It is a question of defending and maintaining the high credit of the country.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, at the proper time I shall offer a substitute for the resolution declaring that gold and silver bullion brought to the mint for coinage ought to be coined by the proper officers for the benefit of the depositor without discrimination against either metal, and that it is the duty of the United States to pay the public debt according to the contract. I will send the substitute to the desk and ask to have it printed.

Mr. GRAY. Let it be read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read. The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That gold and silver bullion brought to the mint for coinage ought to be coined by the proper officers for the benefit of the depositor without discrimination against either metal, and that it is the duty of the United States to pay the public debt according to the contract.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the pending resolution is nothing more or less than a proposition to change all the contracts of the Government of the United States which are printed on every bond. Everybody knows what they are. We have changed this contract for bondholders once before. In 1869, a joint resolution was passed declaring that the obligations of the United States were payable in coin. That was done because the Secretary of the Treasury had declared that they would ultimately be paid in coin, and it was urged that good faith required that we should carry out these unauthorized verbal declarations of the Secretary of the Treasury. We did that and doubled the debt of the United States. Now, it is proposed to change the contract again. Under what circumstances? Under promises? No. Congress did not leave it to the Secretary to make promises, but put it in the law, printed it on the bonds, that they should be payable in coin of the then standard value, to wit, on the 14th of July, 1870. It was printed so plain that a wayfaring man or a fool need not err. It is on every bond to-day. The contract on every bond is plain on its face—on the bonds, on the greenbacks, and on the Treasury notes; and the Treasury notes are expressly payable in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This is a proposition to change contracts. There is nothing more flagrant in the history of the Government than the conduct of the Treasury Department in refusing to exercise the option reserved in the law to pay in either gold or silver coin. It has brought all the trouble upon the country. It is a breach of trust for an agent having a beneficial option to his principal to give that option to the other side. By means of this construction of the law our Treasury has been denuded of gold, a raid has been made upon it, the credit of the Government of the United States has been impaired, until the President of the United States makes a private contract for the sale of $62,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds the very day when the same character of bonds were selling at a rate which would make them worth in the market over 19 per cent premium. This was done without giving the people of the United States an opportunity to bid, when it was notorious that bids were offered a few weeks previous for nearly four times the amount of $50,000,000 of bonds which were then open to subscription; and the offer was made at a rate which would make these bonds sell at more than 19 per cent premium. Ten million dollars on the face of the transaction were given to this syndicate, and after that has been done we are called upon to indorse it by passing a resolution, although we can not legislate, saying we will advise the Treasury Department to go on violating the law.

Somebody ought to appear for the people. All that the people are bound to do is to pay according to contract. The bondholders can take care of themselves. The obligation of the Government to the people is to pay according to contract and not to change the contract. Never was there a grosser proposition to change the contract of the United States and double the obligation of the people. It is proposed now by a resolution, when we can not pass a law, to advise the Treasury Department to violate existing laws and rob the whole people. Let it come. I should like to know whether there is a majority in the Senate willing to place itself in a position of violating a plain law to rob the people for the benefit of the bondholders. The proposition is nothing less than that.

There is no excuse for the present proposition. The excuse of 1869 does not exist now. There are no promises out now which were not made in the face of the express law passed to define the duties of the Administration and to determine the rights of bondholders. It is plain on its face. Because coin bonds have been sold for less than their market value, in order to make it appear that our credit will be destroyed unless we yield to the demands of avarice to the full limit, is no reason why we should be a party to that or any other transaction which robs the people of their legal rights. Here day after day we are refusing to pay honest debts because we have not the money. We are robbing honest people daily on that plea and no other. Unobjected bills to pay honest debts can not be considered here because the Treasury is in such condition that it can not endure it.

When that is the case we are called upon to again double the obligations of the Government, which we did once, because it was then supposed that there was a moral obligation. Here, where there is no moral or legal obligation, on the contrary where there is a duty to protect the people, it is proposed to pass a solemn resolution that we will give it all to the bondholders and let the people suffer. This is no time for such legislation. This is no time to add to the gains of the bondholders illegally and improperly when the country is suffering for bread, when millions are out of employment, when distress is universal in the land. If the pending resolution were passed it would be an excuse for robbing the Government through all ages. It would then be said that the faith of the Government was pledged never to rehabilitate silver, that all our obligations are payable in gold, and to look at bimetalism would be treason to the credit of the Government.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] knows very well that when he secures the adoption of a resolution of Congress declaring that all our obligations shall be payable in gold we must have gold at all hazards. He knows very well that there is no way to get gold except to borrow it; that our indebtedness and our fixed obligations to foreign countries can not be paid with the products of the country, and that we must borrow gold. He knows very well that by passing this resolution he cuts off all possibility of the people of the United States discharging their obligations according to contract, without abject slavery. He knows very well, or he ought to know if he has studied the question, that the burden which such a resolution would impose upon the people would reduce them to slavery or bankruptcy; certainly slavery in the first instance, then perhaps anarchy, despotism, slavery.

It is impossible to pay our debts in gold. It is impossible to get gold for circulation, and everybody who has examined the question knows that that is true. Gold on the Continent is beyond our reach. The gold which Great Britain has she guards, and she has $10,000,000,000, on which she draws interest from us and other countries, principally from us. We know very well that our products will not buy back the gold; that the only way to get it is to borrow it; and if we make such contracts as the Executive has recently made our borrowing days will soon be over. That contract, with all its incidents, may, after all, prove a benefit. It may prove a blessing in disguise. It will disclose the methods of the gold ring. It will disclose how unconscientious they are. It will disclose how they are willing to rob the Government. But, notwithstanding that, if Congress will indorse the action of the Administration the people will be in despair.

Let the resolution pass, and it will bring sorrow to every wealth producer in the land. Everybody knows that. It will make their condition more helpless; double our obligations to the bondholders, and destroy the ability of the people to pay. Never was there a more reprehensible proposition brought into the halls of Congress. It is an attempt to do by a concurrent resolution what we can not do by law; it is an attempt by resolution to repeal the legislation of the last twenty years; it is an attempt to indorse the conduct of an Administration which has repudiated the law and allowed speculators to rob the Treasury, when no other civilized government on earth would do the like; when all honest governments would refuse. We profess to be civilized, but we do not follow the example of civilized nations on the money question. All other civilized countries guard the gold with their laws. The contest for gold has become extremely sharp.

Now it is proposed to pass a concurrent resolution which will utterly destroy the credit of the Government, because if we can not use silver we can not pay our debts. We can not get the gold in Europe. The conditions upon which we get the gold are so grievous that it means the annihilation of every industry to declare that we are bound to do what it is impossible for us to do without ruin to our credit, without ruin to our people. To change a contract, to place us in that relation, I say is the worst proposition ever brought before the Senate for discussion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if this discussion has had no other value it has cleared the atmosphere. It has brought to the attention of the country the desire, if not openly expressed yet illy concealed, of Senators to pay the debts of the Government in silver coin, no matter how degraded, no matter how depreciated it may have become. That is the avowed policy; and it was to ascertain whether that was the true policy proposed, and if possible to present to the country a different policy, that I introduced this resolution.

Mr. President, I have heard no answer to the arguments presented in favor of the adoption of the resolution. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has seen fit to indulge in flings that I am a bimetalist upon a gold basis. I might retort in kind and say he is a bimetalist upon a silver basis. That does not prove anything; it is a mere play upon words. This debate has demonstrated that he is no bimetalist at all, but is a silver monometallist. He says—not because it is the interest of his people, not because it is the metal of his part of the country, but he is for silver upon high and patriotic grounds. If he had not reiterated it we would not have suspected it. It is not necessary that I should repeat what I had the honor to say in the first remarks that I submitted here. If the Senator from Colorado is a bimetalist it can do no harm to sustain the principle in this resolution by his vote. If that is the policy of this Government, as we have repeatedly declared, this is not the time to refuse to reiterate it. It strikes me that this, above all other times, is the favorable opportunity to declare it to the world.

Mr. President, I am not here to bandy words about individual records. In answer to the statement of the Senator from Colorado that no true bimetalist except the two or three who were misled, or hoodwinked, or fooled, voted for the repeal of the Sherman silver law, I might retort that no true friend of silver opposed the repeal of that law. I might suggest that that law was the enemy of silver. I might suggest, what I think I proved in that debate, that it was for the true interests of silver that that obnoxious statute should be wiped off the statute book. Was it defended? Scarcely; and yet for three or four months the alleged friends of silver in this Chamber stood here in solid phalanx resisting its repeal.

It was said upon the side of those who favored repeal that the Sherman law was the worst stab at silver ever perpetrated. It was true that it made silver not a money metal, but reduced it to the level of a commodity. It was shown that it was increasing the public debt of this country by the creation of one hundred and fifty-odd million of Treasury notes. Still the process went on, and to-day the existence of those Treasury notes constitutes one of the perils to the Treasury of the United States. And yet it was proposed to continue that policy. I, sir, as a bimetalist, as one who has always believed in the policy and one who declines to accept the doctrines of these professed friends of silver, say that it was one of the best steps for the maintenance of bimetalism to secure the repeal of that law. So much for that.

The Senator from Colorado has not addressed himself to the pending resolution. He proceeds into an elaborate attack upon the President of the United States and the officers of his Cabinet because of the recent contract made with certain parties in New York representing foreign money lenders. I had not said one word in defense of the contract. I had endeavored to avoid any discussion of that subject, because I did not regard the subject as pertaining to the real point involved in the resolution. But I am not called upon to say at this time whether that contract in all respects meets my approval. I know it has been flippantly said here and elsewhere that the President of the United States should have done this and he should have done that, and it has been asked, why did he not issue bonds for a less term of years; why did he not secure a less rate of interest? Senators forget and the public forget that the President of the United States was hampered by an old statute that absolutely dictated to him substantially the terms under which he could issue bonds. If he has been driven into a corner, if he has been compelled to make a harsh bargain in behalf of this country, it is because of the nonaction of this Congress, supposed to be controlled by the Democratic party; and we have the spectacle here of a Democratic Congress, or it was so until a few days ago, as we supposed, refusing—

Mr. GRAY. The Senator does not mean to say that the Democrats have a majority in this body?

Mr. HILL. We have not now.

Mr. GRAY. That time has passed away.

Mr. HILL. That is true; the Senator is right. I am speaking of a few days since. We deliberately waited and refused and put off the discussion of this question until we found ourselves in a minority in this body.

Mr. President, there have been various efforts made to bring this question to an issue. It has been suggested that the old act of 1875 should be amended so that the President might have been able to get better terms. Congress has refused to amend that law. Congress has kept the President bound by this old statute, and if he has made a harsh bargain it is perhaps because the situation has compelled him to do it. At least this much is proper to be said in defense of the President's action.

But, Mr. President, what do we hear? We hear the Senator from Colorado denouncing the President in unmeasured terms as having made an attack upon the credit of this country, and in the next breath he tells us that in a very short time after this alleged secret contract has been made the credit of the country, instead of being impaired, has been increased, and the bonds, he tells us, are about to be sold in the market for from 115 to 120. And this is the attack that has been made by the President of the United States upon the credit of the country! The credit of the country has immediately advanced, and its bonds are selling at a higher rate than they have been in many long years. Sir, men may be blind to the signs of the times if they have a mind to. Men can shut their eyes. Without at this time approving (because it is not necessary for me to express an opinion upon that point) the details of this contract, without approving some of the suggestions made in the message of the President, I am here to say that the President has undoubtedly endeavored to do his duty as he understood it. I am here to say that the statement is unwarranted, unjustified, that the President has desired or endeavored to give to the syndicate a higher rate of interest than he felt obliged to do.

Mr. President, it is unworthy of Senators upon this floor to make such an attack. It is not necessary that I should reply to it. Mr. Cleveland has his faults; but, sir, no Senator has a right to say that he has deliberately gone to work and given a higher rate of interest for the bonds than he was compelled or felt constrained to do. It ought not to have been said. What do we know of the efforts that have been made, except as we may glean them from some statements in the public press, which may or may not be entirely reliable? I pass over such charges as substantially unworthy of notice. It is sufficient for me that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury tell us that they obtained the best terms possible under all the circumstances of the case, and I am disposed to accept that statement in good faith.

Mr. President, no prejudice can be stirred up, and the Senator who thinks that he can stir up prejudice against this Administration simply because a contract has been made with the Rothschilds is mistaken. I am no defender of the Rothschilds, but I say the attitude of Congress has compelled the financial officer of this Government to make a contract with whoever has the money. Should he have gone out and made an appeal to the miners of Colorado? Would they have furnished this money at any rate of interest? No.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to say to the Senator—

Mr. HILL. Wait until I am through.

Mr. WOLCOTT. He has asked me a question about the miners of Colorado. They have been so impoverished by the legislation advocated by the Senator from New York, who has claimed to be a bimetalist, that they can not subscribe on any terms. But there are plenty of Americans who would have subscribed on a 3 per cent basis if there had been a public application for bids.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, there are a large number of men who always say "I told you so." There are a large number of men who say they would have come forward and would have taken these bonds, and yet when the President was negotiating you never heard of them.

Mr. President, a loan like $62,000,000 in gold must sometimes be made from the money kings of the world. You can not sometimes well go elsewhere. It was what this Administration felt obliged to do. It was what a Republican Administration would probably have been obliged to do. Is this the first time in the history of this Government that we have borrowed money from the Rothschilds? No; the records of this Government show that repeatedly, over and over again, Republican Administrations borrowed money from Rothschild and from other money lenders of Europe. The attempt to stir up some prejudice among the people because the Administration borrowed this money in London I say is uncalled for and unwarranted.

The Senator from Colorado says that he is a true bimetalist. I remind him that it is very easy to be a bimetalist based upon silver in Colorado. It is the sentiment of his people. I avowed my belief in the principle of bimetalism years ago. I live in a community where many of its business men, I regret to say, are not bimetalists. I regret to say that many of them, especially in the great city of New York, believe in the gold standard. I have shown by my votes in this Chamber that I do not wholly agree with them. I have on two or three occasions taken my political life in my hands in voting in favor of bimetalism in this Chamber, and it ill becomes the Senator from Colorado to taunt me with not being a true bimetalist. When it goes with the wishes of his people it is easy enough. It is not so easy when a man has somewhat of a public tide to contend against.

Mr. President, the question of the issue of these bonds, the circumstances or the manner of their issuing, have really nothing to do with this question. Concede all that is said, concede every allegation made, which I do not, but simply for the purposes of the argument, after all the question comes back whether it is not wise for this Congress at this time to express its opinion on the subject of bimetalism.

The Senator suggests that the resolution can not be divided. Evidently he does not want it divided. What a spectacle would be furnished here by Senators who profess to be the friends of silver voting against a resolution to declare the policy of the Government to be in favor of bimetalism. This is the hour for such a declaration above all others, when our credit is being attacked, when it is being said in Europe that we intend to go to a silver basis, when there is a difference in interest between our gold bonds, if such can be issued, and our coin bonds. It is opportune that we should declare in this resolution that we are in favor of bimetalism.

Mr. President, I agree with all the Senator says, with all that he professes to hope for in the final success of bimetalism in this country. Although I in part represent a constituency many of whom prefer gold to silver—interests in New York (I mean certain business interests that profess confidence in the gold standard)—I want bimetalism to succeed. I am in favor of any policy that will bring that result about. I hail therefore with joy the Associated Press dispatch which has just been handed me a few moments ago, and which I will read:

[Associated Press.]

BERLIN, February 16.

The Reichstag to-day adopted the resolution submitted yesterday by Count Von Mirbach, instructing the federal Government to issue invitations for an international monetary conference to take action for the rehabilitation of silver as a circulating medium.

I rejoice in that just as much as the Senator from Colorado; in fact, I think a little more so, because if we are in favor of bimetalism it follows that we are in favor of international bimetalism. I believe it to be the first policy of this Government to establish international bimetalism if it is possible, and that the last resort should be simply bimetalism alone.

Mr. President, we must keep our eyes steady to the front in these times. The advocates of silver I think are giving the country and the world a wrong impression of what the American Government proposes to do. We propose to pay in either coin. That is the contract. I have not personally suggested any different contract. I have simply said we reserve the right to pay in either, but if we fail, if there does arise a discrepancy and a discrimination, then we shall pay in the highest money of the world.

Mr. President, can there be any objection to that? I submit not. I say to the Senators upon the other side of this question who differ with me in regard to this resolution that a resolution to-day passed through both Houses of Congress just exactly like this will reassure the friends of bimetalism in Germany. Have they not declared in favor of bimetalism? Why not answer them in a dispatch saying the American Congress to-day has passed a resolution for bimetalism? And we also go further. We do not intend to cheat the creditors of this Government. If we can not pay in silver that is equal to gold we will pay in gold. That is all our resolution declares.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from New York if it would not be much more effective and much more to the point if we would adopt the proposed legislation that is on the table, or which can be placed there in three minutes, establishing real bimetalism in this country, rather than to adopt a mere vapory resolution?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have repeatedly said—

Mr. GRAY. It would postpone it.

Mr. HILL. Absolutely, as the Senator from Delaware says, such legislation as that sprung upon the country at this hour would postpone for many long years to come the very goal that you are trying to reach.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the same thing that has been said here for a number of years.

Mr. HILL. It is just as true now as then and has been true all the time; and it is utter folly to think that this Government can make a success of the free coinage of silver immediately, with its vast amount of paper money afloat, with $500,000,000 of paper money afloat, which you are obliged to redeem every hour that it is presented, with the present condition of the finances in the country, with the condition of your industries as they are to-day, with an Administration somewhat hostile possibly to the policy here suggested. It would be suicide, it would be lunacy, to attempt any such thing under existing conditions.

Mr. President, this is a business question. It must be determined according to business principles. You can not jump from the present situation over into the free coinage of silver in an instant. There must be ample preparation; there must be revised laws; there must be proper steps taken toward it. I reiterate what I said before, that one of the first steps toward this result should be the elimination of your paper fiat currency. That is the first step. Then you pave the way for other legislation.

Mr. President, I said, and I do not care to reiterate it, that I thought that was the thing to do; but it seems we can not do it. It seems that the friends of silver, or some of them, stand here protecting the greenbacks. They do not want them retired. They resist all legislation of this character. When you ask if we retire the greenbacks what is to be restored in its place, it can be easily answered. There are those who say that silver should eventually take its place. It can be done far better when greenbacks are removed than it can be done now. It can not be safely done at this moment. That is my answer to the suggestion.

Mr. President, this resolution has been carefully drawn. I had intended, as I said, to avoid any of the things about which we might reasonably differ. I have not approved in specific terms the action of the President in making this contract. That has nothing to do with this question. I have not sought to approve or disapprove the question of the issuing of gold bonds alone. That does not concern this question. It is not necessary to enter upon a discussion of that question. It is not necessary to determine what further legislation is necessary in the near future to bring about bimetalism. I simply think it opportune, I think it wise. I think so as a true friend of bimetalism, whether my friends on the other side wish to accept me as their ally or not.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] shakes his head. He says he does not want me as an ally. I am pretty certain, then, that I shall be in good company on the other side. I am content to stand here as I stood in 1893 when I advocated the repeal of the Sherman silver law, and I advocated it in the interests of bimetalism. The Senator from Colorado says that it has not brought the prosperity to the country that it ought to have done. I have already read an extract from the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in which he substantially said that one of the causes of the depletion of the gold was the existence of these greenbacks, and yet it was proposed by silver men, as I said, to continue the policy of issuing the Treasury notes ad libitum.

Mr. President, that repeal question has passed away. I did not suppose there was a single Senator around this circle who regrets that vote. The junior Senator from Colorado suggested that there were some who regretted it. I do not know of anyone. I think that the declaration contained in that act, put in there by the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, was a most important one. He had been a lifelong friend of bimetalism; he had been a friend of silver. It was no desertion of his cause when he stood up here and advocated the repeal of that law. I know somewhat of the efforts that were made to induce him to take out that important declaration from that bill, and that he steadily refused to do so, and insisted upon its maintenance.

It may be said that that is sufficient. It may be said, as was intimated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that this perhaps is an unnecessary declaration. Mr. President, I do not think so. I think it is wise, and I think the best service which can be rendered to silver to-day is for every friend of silver to vote for this resolution committing the country first to bimetalism. It does not commit anybody to the payment of these bonds in gold unless there is a difference between gold and silver. I regret to hear any Senator around this circle assert that if in the future history of this country one portion of our currency shall become deteriorated they will refuse to pay it in the highest and the best currency.

Mr. President, the resolution is here. I have discharged my duty, as I understand it, by the presentation of the resolution. The Senate can do with it as it chooses. I think it is appropriate and pertinent at this time. Our friends need not be alarmed about it. It will help the cause of bimetalism. It will not help the cause of monometallism, either of gold or silver. It will help the double standard; it will help the friends of bimetalism, Balfour and others, in England; it will help the friends of bimetalism who hear this resolution in Berlin to-day. In my judgment the highest duties of patriotism require that we should adopt it.

Mr. President, it is safe because it only says not that we shall issue gold bonds, but simply that we shall maintain at a parity every dollar of the Government of the United States. Every Senator can afford to stand upon that ground. What is the other position? What is the alternative and the opposite of this proposition? You will talk in favor of a double standard, but when it comes to the question of the payment of our bonds you say we are going to pay them in a depreciated currency, if we have got it.

Mr. President, we can not stand upon any such position. Patriotism forbids it. The best interests of the country forbid it. In my judgment, neither the Democratic party nor the Republican party nor any other party can afford to antagonize the resolution.

MINERAL LANDS IN MONTANA AND IDAHO.

Mr. BERRY submitted the following report; which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3476) to provide for the examination and classification of certain mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments:

In line 8 of section 2, after the word "and," strike out the words "two of whom at least residents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a resident;" and the Senate agree to the same.

In lines 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 of section 3, after the word "determine," strike out the words "and to enable the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to select the indemnity for mineral lands, as provided in its charter, the surveyor-general for said State or States shall compute the area of said unsurveyed tract or tracts so classified as mineral;" and the Senate agree to the same.

In line 23 of section 5, after the word "published," strike out the words "in the capital cities of Montana and Idaho" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the capital city of the State in which the lands may be situated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

In lines 43, 44, and 45 of section 5, strike out the words "or by some proper officer of the Interior Department, detailed by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose, who shall receive a compensation not exceeding," and insert in lieu thereof the words "unless the Secretary of the Interior shall detail some proper officer of the Department of the Interior for that purpose. The compensation for such service shall not exceed;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES H. BERRY,

T. C. POWER,

FRED. T. DUBOIS,

Conferees on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS C. McRAE,

W. R. ELLIS,

Conferees on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PLATT. I should like a brief explanation of the second amendment, where some words are stricken out with reference to the selection of indemnity lands for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that in the Senate there was an amendment inserted in these words:

And to enable the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to select the indemnity for mineral lands as provided in its charter, the surveyor-general for said State or States shall compute the area of said unsurveyed tract or tracts so classified as mineral.

Those words were stricken out of the bill because they had no proper place in it, and because there were certain members of the committee who were opposed to interfering in any way, either to ratify or to reject the original grant. They simply wanted it to stand on its merits unaffected by this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Let me ask the Senator another question, which will perhaps get at the matter which I have in mind.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. PLATT. If this bill passes, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company is liable to lose some of the lands which it now claims under its grant. Is there any provision in this bill, or in any other bill, whereby they will be entitled to indemnity lands for those lost?

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the original grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company provided that if they failed to get the lands in the original grant they should be entitled to certain indemnity lands. This bill does not in any way interfere with that right. If they have that right now, they will still have it without regard to this bill.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4600) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate resume the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8737) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the amendment which was reserved for consideration this morning, on page 23, beginning in line 9, be read. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] desired to be heard on that amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I shall avail myself of the liberal rules of the Senate to say a few words about a subject not directly connected with the bill before the Senate, inasmuch as the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] occupied the morning hour, and there was then no opportunity to reply to some suggestions he made.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I suggest to him that I think we can finish this bill in a very short time, and then he will have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. TELLER. I prefer to go on now, if the Senator please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not care to go into any discussion of the character of the bimetallism of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. He may be an ardent and devoted friend of true bimetallism. We have his statement that he is. I must say, however, that it seems to me he pursues a very curious method of arriving at bimetallism when he proposes to provide by a concurrent resolution that all the obligations of the Government which are payable in coin shall be payable in gold. If that is the method by which he proposes to reach bimetallism, I must say for myself that I do not belong to that class of bimetallists, and I shall decline to follow him in that direction.

We heard the Senator in 1893, when he posed here in the Senate as the special champion of the white metal and declared that he was a better silver man than anybody representing the silver-producing States, that he was a better silver man than anybody who had been advocating the cause of silver in this Senate for many years, and that he had then discovered a new way to arrive at bimetallism by a short and speedy method, which was the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. Mr. President, that was to put silver up; that was to put everything else up in this country; that was to restore confidence; that was the panacea for the evils we were then suffering from, which, I am sorry to say, we are still suffering from, notwithstanding the prophecies of the Senator and his great efforts to secure that repeal. I admit that the Senator was a potent factor in securing that repeal.

That is the only effort I know of that the Senator has ever made for silver when there was anything practical to come out of his action. He has talked about silver here and elsewhere, and he may have given on one or two occasions, when there was no prospect of the enactment of the measure, a vote in that direction. I will not say he has not; but if the Senator from New York has ever given a vote in this body which would indicate any great desire on his part to arrive at a true bimetallic standard I do not now recall it. If he has, it would be in order for the Senator from New York to call my attention to it.

Mr. President, the resolution the Senator from New York has offered is the most remarkable resolution which has been before the Senate for many a day. I shall endeavor not to be offensive in characterizing it; I shall endeavor to keep within the rules of the Senate. It will be a little difficult for me to do that, but I recognize the obligation to do so upon my part as a member of this body. So I shall try to speak of the resolution in parliamentary terms, if I can.

What does the resolution contain? It is a concurrent resolution; it is a resolution which, if it shall pass both bodies, will have the force and effect of law. Its effect will be to make every obligation of the Government now payable in coin payable in gold. That is what the Senator intends; that is the purpose of the resolution.

I want to say to the Senator that nobody who has given any attention to the silver question will be fooled into the belief that this will accomplish anything in the interest of bimetallism, or that the Senator hopes or expects that it will. I trust that is not unparliamentary, Mr. President.

The declaration of this resolution, as to what is the policy of the Government, accompanied by a declaration that is to be crystallized into law, that every obligation of the Government shall be paid in gold, makes it too plain to admit of controversy what the purpose and object of the Senator was in its introduction. Every man must be supposed to mean the logical and proper consequences of his act. The Senator can not pretend that he does not know that that will do what this Congress has refused to do by inaction in this body and by positive declaration twice in the other body. He knows very well that it would do what the United States and what everybody else here knows the American people do not intend shall be done.

Mr. President, in 1869 we declared, in what is called the public-credit act by some, by a resolution, a principle which has caused more scandal than any public transaction of which I know, except the one which has occurred within the last few days.

This resolution, I repeat, is intended to do by indirection, and yet directly, but in a less direct method than by an act of Congress, not only what the House of Representatives has declared it would not do, but to do very much more; because no proposition has been submitted either to this body or to the other that I know of during this session which has looked to the making of all the obligations of the United States which are payable in coin payable in gold. The only suggestion which has come from the executive department of the Government is that the new bonds now to be issued shall be payable in gold. Of course, those of us who have been familiar with the condition of the country for the last twenty years realize that that was but the first step toward demanding that all coin obligations should ultimately be made payable in gold coin; but the Executive had not quite the courage to ask that; there has been no demand for it anywhere. But the Senator from New York comes in as the champion of the public credit, and at the same time as the champion and friend of silver in the United States, and proposes to put us upon a gold standard, with every obligation payable in gold, and thus raising an embarrassing question, if we should attempt to adopt bimetallism either by international agreement or by our own act, that we had a large amount of indebtedness payable by law in gold which we could not change without violating the principles of honesty and justice which we are bound to respect in our treatment of our creditors.

The Senator says that this is the policy of the Government. It never has been the policy of this Government by law to pay in gold. We have declared in this body and in the other by overwhelming majorities that every bond which the Government issued under the act of 1870 was payable in silver or gold at the option of the Government, and that it was not a violation of the public faith of the Government to pay in silver. It may have been the policy of the Administration, but it has not been the policy of that branch of the Government which fixes the policy of the American people by law. I know that Administrations have said repeatedly that we would pay in gold. I have not myself doubted that we would pay in the metal that was recognized as necessary in making payment in order to carry out the spirit of our contract. As I said the other day, in my judgment we would pay in good money when we paid these debts. I said we would pay in gold or we would pay in silver, but in either case it would be good money. We would make silver equal to gold if we used silver.

We have never contended for the payment of the national debt in depreciated money, and there has been no demand from the people of the United States, either in the silver-producing States or elsewhere, that the Government of the United States should ever violate its plighted faith. When we have demanded that we should have the right to pay in silver it was to enable us to maintain the parity between gold and silver. We have six hundred and odd million dollars of bonds which are now payable in coin as a pledge and a support to the maintenance of the parity of the coin in this country, silver and gold. We have besides $500,000,000 of Treasury notes, a total of $1,100,000,000 of money, or money's worth, in this country, as to all of which we are, and especially the owners and holders thereof, interested in maintaining the parity between silver and gold as money.

The Senator from New York seeks to make it the intent of the people holding our bonds and paper money to demand that there shall be a divergence between silver and gold, where gold shall be more valuable, because it is mentioned in the bond. It is a great temptation he proposes to put before them to come to Congress and seek to procure legislation to depreciate the silver money of the country and to enhance the value of gold when they have their payments in gold. They will not do it now. If they come here and suggest anything which will depreciate the silver dollar, they know that the option is left with the Government to pay them with that depreciated dollar if it chooses, and that is what helps to maintain the parity between the two metals; that is a most potent factor in the maintenance of it, and the Senator knows that, or he knows nothing of finance, and I would not charge him with not knowing so much as that.

I know, Mr. President, that in the last ninety days there has been a decided effort made to irrevocably put this country on a basis which will forever compel it to remain where it is now with its low prices, on a gold basis, so that the honest sentiment which prevails with the American people can be appealed to: "You have your contract payable in gold, and you can not have any other law than a gold law." The American people are a law-abiding and a debt-paying people; they do not want to pay their debts in cheap money, but they do not want to give to the holders of money in this country the right to appreciate the dollar and depreciate everything else in this country; and it seems to me this morning as if the distinguished Senator from New York had joined in that effort of appreciation of money and depreciation of commodities.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TELLER. I will first yield to the Senator from Georgia and afterwards to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he does not think that the effect of the resolution of the Senator from New York, if passed by Congress, would be to place this country exclusively and solely upon a gold basis?

Mr. TELLER. Beyond question. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator explain how it could place us on a gold basis when the resolution declares on its face that the policy of the Government shall be bimetallism? The Senator's statement is a contradiction in terms, it seems to me.

Mr. TELLER. I have heard Senators on this floor declare they were bimetallists who had never given a vote in the interest of bimetallism and who had never lost an opportunity to give every vote they cast against bimetallism. That did not make them bimetallists.

The Senator's declaration is as to a policy. That declaration is mere words, and the law is with the gold people. As I said while the Senator was out of the Chamber, it seemed to me that it was not unfair to charge that the Senator intended just what must be the result of his resolution, to put the country on a gold basis, or in a position where it could not escape from it.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the Senator how that can be. Does the resolution say much more than the Senator has said, that he intended to pay in the best money?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator, in my absence from the Chamber, read a quotation from a speech I made the other day, which I do not take back. I have never said that the Government of the United States would pay under all circumstances in gold coin. I said the Government of the United States would pay in the best money; that it would make silver, if it paid in silver, as good as gold, which it can do when it opens its mints to silver as it opens its mints to gold. But if the holders of securities and the great financial trusts of this country shall succeed, as the Senator from New York thinks they may and as the President thinks they have, in creating a premium on gold, I want to say to the Senator from New York that when that has been done the American people will not justify their Government in paying to the holders of its bonds the highest, the appreciated, and the exaggerated money so far as its purchasing power is concerned.

Mr. HILL. If I understand the Senator he does not propose to pay the money that is highest and best unless it happens to be silver.

Mr. STEWART. Unless we have a contract to so pay.

Mr. TELLER. If we have agreed to pay in gold we will pay in gold, and if our creditors prefer gold we will pay in gold, unless it is at a sacrifice, which no decent Government ever ought to indulge in.

The effort now being made is to put gold to a premium. There has been—I will not say a conspiracy—but there has been an effort to do that for many months. Everywhere you have heard in financial circles that gold was going to a premium, and then when it goes to a premium to demand that the obligations of the Government shall be paid in that money. I hear a Senator say gold is at a premium. It is at a premium over everything else in this country. It has increased in its purchasing power from 30 to 40 per cent above what it was a few years ago. Everything else has gone down and gold has gone up. We have maintained our silver on an equality with gold simply because we allow it to perform the same functions in this country that gold performs, because we have the right at all times to use it for any purpose for which we can use gold, even to buying our bonds with it and redeeming our greenbacks and Treasury notes with it.

The Senator from New York seems to be anxious that we shall be put in a position where we can no longer do that, when we must pay in gold. All the advocates of gold bonds are in favor of putting the Government in a position where it can not use its silver and its gold with equal money functions and equal money power.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from Colorado understand me to say that I am specially advocating that?

Mr. TELLER. I did not hear all that the Senator from New York said. I was engaged in a conference committee and did not get into the Chamber until the Senator was through with his first remarks. But how a Senator who is in favor of the pending resolution can vote against saying that every bond hereafter issued shall be payable in gold I can not imagine.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator speak upon this point: Suppose we issued bonds payable in coin at a time when we coined both gold and silver and subsequently the United States demonetized silver, would the Senator then contend that we should undertake to pay those bonds in silver after we ourselves had demonetized silver?

Mr. TELLER. We use the phrase "demonetized silver," but we never did demonetize silver in the United States to that extent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it not the contention as to the act of 1873 that it demonetized silver?

Mr. TELLER. The act of 1873 simply denied the holder of silver access to the mint. It did not take away the money function of the silver dollars in circulation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did it not depreciate silver coin?

Mr. TELLER. Not a bit of it. Not a silver dollar in the United States has fallen a cent or a mill below its par value up to this hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, if the Senator from Colorado claims that we have a right to pay our existing debt in silver coin, does he hold that we are under obligation immediately thereafter to redeem the silver coin in gold coin?

Mr. TELLER. There is not a nation on the face of the green earth that redeems its silver in gold or its gold in silver. It is a most monstrous money proposition that primary money is to be redeemed. It is only representative money that is exchanged for primary money. We do not do it here. You can not go to the Treasury with a silver dollar or a silver certificate and get a gold dollar to save your life. There never has been an hour when you could do that.

What I contend for is that the Government of the United States has the option to pay in silver, which is of great value to us in maintaining the parity of gold and silver coins. That is one of the functions of money, to pay bonds.

We have $600,000,000 of them out, and the Lord only knows how many more are to come out. The silver dollar will pay taxes. If you take away its tax-paying power and its bond-paying power it will depreciate in an hour. It is duty paying. Shut your custom-houses against the silver dollar, shut your Treasury against the silver dollar, and the silver dollar will fall, of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, let me ask the Senator whether, if the United States had done that by any policy which it had pursued, it does not remain its duty to pay its bonds in gold nevertheless?

Mr. TELLER. The Government of the United States has no obligation upon it to pay its bonds in gold any more than in silver. The silver dollar to-day is as good for the owner of a gold bond, and will buy as much and pay as much. In fact, in practice he does get silver very frequently. He is demanding now that we shall keep the country upon a gold basis so that he may get the money that will buy the most of the world's products. That is what the Senator from New York means when he says the best dollar.

That is what the cant that is so prevalent in this Chamber means. When people talk about our being entitled to the best dollar, they mean the dollar that will buy the most sweat and toil; the dollar that will buy the largest quantity of farm products; the dollar that will take the most blood. That is what they mean. What we call the honest dollar is the dollar of the contract, what we agreed to pay and at the time we agreed to pay it.

I do not intend at this time to go at length into this question. I did not intend, however, that the Senator from New York should parade himself before the country as the champion of silver. We shall welcome him to our ranks whenever he comes honestly with views that will help us. We do not recognize him if his resolution contains his sentiments. He will be of no assistance to us and no assistance to the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I can not sit down after the remarks of the Senator from New York about the recent contract made by the Government of the United States with this foreign banking syndicate without some comment on it. The Senator says he is not the defender of the President of the United States. He is the only man yet who has risen in this Chamber to defend that transaction. Other Senators may rise in time, but up to this hour the Senator from New York is the only man who has had the courage to stand before the American people and tell them it is an honest transaction and that the President did the best he could. It takes a degree of courage that very few men have, in view of the fact that the public understand the matter, to tell them that $62,000,000 of the securities of the best Government in the world were sold at 4 per cent below the securities of Egypt. The Senator from New York has been noted for his bravery and his courage. He has outdone himself, however, when he can stand here and tell us that the American people will approve of this act and that it is indecent for an American Senator on this floor to criticize that transaction. Mr. President, his ideas of the duty of an American Senator are not mine.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a moment? I said that any deliberate statement that the President of the United States had agreed to pay a larger rate of interest than he believed he was obliged to pay was unworthy of a Senator of the United States; and I reiterate it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from New York has a right to make any statement he sees fit.

Mr. HILL. The Senator ought not to put words in my mouth which I did not utter.

Mr. TELLER. I will not. But I am going to debate this question for a few minutes, and I shall criticize this transaction exactly as I should criticize it if the President of the United States were a Republican and not a Democrat. As an American Senator I am here to protect the credit and the reputation and the property of the United States. I am not to be frightened by the suggestion that it is unworthy of me to put this matter squarely before the people of the United States as the most scandalous transaction in public affairs that has occurred since my entrance into public life, or since I have had any acquaintance with public affairs, and that is nigh on to fifty years. I have been a student of the conduct of my Government for nearly fifty years, and I say here now that it is the first time in the history of this country that the people have a right to charge absolutely a lack of honesty on the part of an Administration in dealing with its financial affairs.

Mr. President, we are told, and it is desired that the American people shall understand, that a thirty-year 4 per cent bond, which was sold for 4.49 was a proper sale and the best that could be done when a twelve-year 4 per cent bond on the market was selling for \$1.10 $\frac{1}{4}$ . You can not escape this transaction by saying the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else is unlearned in finance or unacquainted with public business. There is the published record of the country that bonds less valuable than these by 9 cents on a hundred were selling for \$1.10 $\frac{1}{4}$ . A few weeks ago we put on the market \$50,000,000 of bonds and sold them at a rate which will bring less than 3 per cent interest. The day this contract was made those bonds were selling in the markets of this country for more than 16 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent and they had only ten years to run, and the American people bid for those bonds 117 and for many more than those sold.

We had here the other day from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] a stump speech in a bill which he entitled "A bill to save to the people of the United States $16,170,770." That is the nearest anybody on this floor has heretofore come to defending this transaction. Thirty million dollars of this money is said to come from abroad. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] this morning stated what I believe to be the fact, and what I believe a number of Senators on this floor can verify and sustain, that the syndicate which bought the bonds of the United States—

Mr. STEWART. And has a contract to buy more.

Mr. TELLER. And which has a contract to buy at this figure all that we may be compelled to issue to the 1st of October next, now has offers for \$135,000,000 of these bonds at a rate that gives the syndicate a profit of 8 cents on the dollar; and that, too, before it puts up its money; that, too, before it gets its bonds. Yet the Senator from New York, the newborn champion of the Administration and the President, gets up here and says, "The President has done the best he could. Oh, you hampered him in your misconduct here." We have had on the statute books for many years a law which requires all bonds issued by this Government to be payable in coin. We have maintained in every market of the world a higher grade for those securities than that of any other nation on the face of the earth, Great Britain not excepted; and there is no depreciation of those bonds to this hour. Notwithstanding the attack which the Administration has made upon the Government's credit, it has not been able to depreciate those bonds, and the bonds which it declared it could not sell above \$1.0449 the holders refused \$1.13 $\frac{1}{4}$  for three days ago in the city of New York.

Mr. President, every bond of the \$62,000,000 could have been sold in this country on the basis of \$1.19 $\frac{1}{4}$ . The Secretary of the Treasury less than two months ago, before the House committee, declared that to be the value of a 4 per cent thirty-year bond; and if he had not so declared, any person familiar with money transactions knows that when the 4 per cent twelve-years were selling, as they were, at a premium of 10 $\frac{1}{4}$ , these ought by all rules of investment to have brought 19 $\frac{1}{4}$ .

I am in favor of the free coinage of silver. The people whom I represent are in favor of it. But, Mr. President, this contract has but little to do with that question. That is a question that is not directly connected with silver, as the Senator from New York said. But the Senator saw fit to discuss it. The people whom I represent believe that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to maintain its credit. They believe, further, that when the Government of the United States puts its bonds upon the market it is bound by all rules of honesty and decency to get the highest market price therefor.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. In the first remarks I had the honor of making in favor of the resolution I distinctly stated that I did not intend to discuss any question arising out of the issue of those bonds. On the contrary, the Senator's colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] then proceeded to discuss that question, and I replied to him.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator, at all events, thought he was bound to defend the contract.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from New York has stated what he did say; but the Senator from Colorado can, of course, construe it as he pleases.

Mr. TELLER. The statement that the President had done the best he could is a defense of that contract. If I believed that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury had done the best they could I would palsy my arm before I would stand here and denounce them. He may have done the best he could with those men; but there were 70,000,000 Americans who had a right to bid for those bonds. They were denied that opportunity, and why were they denied that opportunity?

The Senator from New York asks, with a sneer, what will the miners of Colorado do about taking them? Mr. President, the miners of Colorado, as my colleague has said, have not been well treated by the Government, and they have been in poverty and distress by reason of the vicious legislation of Congress. But I will guarantee that west of the Alleghany Mountains there can be a million dollars of these bonds sold at \$1.19 $\frac{1}{4}$ . More than that, I will guarantee that one-tenth of these bonds can be promptly sold in the extreme Northwest. The banks of Denver, Omaha, Sioux City, and Kansas City and other cities of that region would be delighted to take these thirty-year bonds at \$1.19 $\frac{1}{4}$ .

I have in my pocket a letter from one of the most distinguished bankers of the great city of New York, who presides over a great and successful bank, who predicts to me that in ninety days these bonds will bring $1.20 in every market in the world; and he assures me that the men who had subscribed a million and a quarter of dollars find when the allotment comes that they are only entitled to one-twelfth of that amount.

Oh, Mr. President, it will not do for the Senator from New York to insist that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury have done the best they could. I do not mean now to have anybody understand that I am charging that the President of the United States has financially profited by this transaction or that his Secretary of the Treasury has done so. I can not conceive what influence should have induced such a contract, except that I must attribute it to the anxiety on the part of the Administration to compel the issue of gold bonds. It is possible that the President of the United States believed that if he came here with a proposition saying that he had made a loan for \$62,000,000 at 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, payable in gold, by his declaration, according to the policy of the Government, and accompanied it with a declaration that if they were specifically payable by law in gold he might make the contract for 3 per cent, we would authorize the issue of such bonds.

The President of the United States may have thought that the American Senate and the American House would not stand before the American people and say, "We prefer to pay in thirty years $16,000,000 rather than to put the Government of the United States in the position of being compelled upon all its obligations to pay gold, whether it has it or not, rather than put the great moneyed powers of the country in control of the financial affairs of the country to the extent that they could by law demand gold of the Government on all its obligations." Perhaps he thought he could frighten us into action.

Mr. President, if that is the excuse it is not very much better, in my judgment, than is the other horn of the dilemma. When the executive department of the Government shall attempt to coerce the legislative and representative part of the nation by making it necessary for them to act or allow a large loss to the people, that is not in accordance with my notions of the obligation that one branch of the Government owes to the other.

Mr. President, we are powerless. It may be said that it is not worth while to discuss this question. The contract has been made. We do not know yet with whom. We have got some of the terms, but I believe nobody is yet able to name who are the contractors. I believe somebody has stated who the witness to the contract is. I believe it is a gentleman who is well known in public life, although not in public office. But nobody has yet ventured to say to us who were the contracting parties on the part of the syndicate. I suppose in due time we shall learn, when the money shall be paid into the Treasury and when it shall go out again, and when a new issue of bonds shall be called for, as it will be. It is barely possible we may hear then who are the contracting parties. It does not make very much difference who are the contracting parties. The question is, has the Government of the United States put its bonds upon the market at a rate very much below their value? That is the question the Administration must answer. That is the question on which the American people demand an answer from the Administration.

My colleague said that there had been a base attack by the Administration upon the credit of the Government. I want to say that during the last fifteen years the only attacks that have ever been made upon the credit of the United States have come from the Treasury Department. I have never heard anywhere of an attack upon the credit of the United States that did not come from the Treasury Department. Different Secretaries of the Treasury have been telling the people for years that there was danger of great discredit attaching to the Government of the United States because of its monetary system, because it might pay its debts in silver. That has been intensified by the present Administration. The President, in the message he sent to us in December, spoke of the condition we were in as being one of great and imminent danger, as if the credit of the United States was like the credit of some great banking house trembling all the time and ready to be destroyed.

On the 28th of January he sent us another message, which I shall not stop to read, in which he reiterated the same idea that the credit of the United States was in great danger, and on the 8th of February he sent us another. Mr. President, if the credit of the United States is in danger at all it has been in danger because of the lack of business tact and business sense that has characterized the administration of the finances of this country for the last few months. The President of the United States tells us that the great trouble and suffering the Government has is owing to a loss of gold; and then he presents a system of finance to us that no sensible financier can for a moment assert would have saved the Government from its gold obligations as they now exist, if they exist at all. It was, as I said on a former occasion, a proposition to encourage a paper-money system the like of which has never been seen, to increase the paper money of this country to an alarming degree, and to retire the money that has been recognized to be as good as gold ever since 1879, when we resumed specie payment.

Later than the 8th of February we had another proposition, a proposition that in my judgment violates every fundamental principle of a monetary science. I only need to refer to the fact that with a nation struggling as we have been honestly struggling to keep $400,000,000 of silver money that we have in the country at par with gold, the proposition is deliberately made that by law we shall declare that there is a distinction between the two coins. Nothing could have been more shortsighted. Nothing that could have been done could have more certainly created a divergence between gold and silver and put gold at a premium than that suggestion of the President of the United States that we demand gold for import dues.

Then later on he comes to us with his astounding proposition that in the midst of an abundance of money in this country, congealed at the great money centers without an opportunity to loan it for more than 1½ to 3 per cent at the utmost, he had been compelled to sell $63,000,000 of our bonds at 3½ per cent, which nets us 104.48, when, as I said before, the Egyptian securities are selling for 4 per cent above that—securities that are collected by the whip and spur, if I may use the term, of the British Government, securities that every man knows are not worth their face whenever Great Britain shall retire from the control of Egypt.

Mr. President, there is not a principality, however small, that I know anything about on the face of this green earth that is paying 3½ per cent interest on its loans. I refer to modern loans. New Zealand, Ceylon, and the islands of the sea are making loans at better rates than we, the richest and greatest people in the world. The Senator from New York says that we are compelled to do this because we would not authorize a gold bond, and yet he tells us that it is the policy of the Government to pay in gold, and the President says these bonds must be paid in gold.

Mr. President, that has been the policy of every Administration when this syndicate of bankers headed, as we understand, by Mr. Morgan, of New York, and Mr. Belmont, representing the foreign bankers, came here and told the President of the United States that they wanted a gold bond. As that was the policy, why did not the President say it has been the policy of the Government of the United States to pay in gold. We shall continue to pay in gold, but we are not going to change our policy, nor to declare by law that it is necessary there should be a statute to require that they should be paid in gold. Why did he not say to them, "You know that the fours now on the market are payable in coin? They are worth $1.10½?" Why did he not say, "The 5 per cents are worth $1.16½, and if you deal with us you deal upon the proposition that the bonds are payable in gold?" He tells us that they are payable in gold; that there must be no doubt but that they will be paid in gold. Did he tell them that they were payable in gold? I have no doubt but he did. But he deals, he says, upon a silver basis. He says, "They take these bonds upon the idea that they may be paid in silver."

Mr. President, there never was a greater mistake than that. Not a single one of those bonds was taken upon the theory that it would be paid in silver. If those men understood that they were to be paid in silver at the world's estimation of silver bullion to-day they would have brought 60 cents instead of $1.04. It is apparent on the face of the transaction that they expected these bonds to be paid in gold, or, if in silver, as good as gold. They have got the pledge of the Administration that they shall be paid in gold; and yet we are given a bounty of nearly 1 per cent on this transaction, a thing we never did before, and we have never named gold in our bonds.

Mr. President, this transaction is a part and parcel of the great effort that has been made and is being made to put this country upon a gold basis and keep it there. The appeal is made to us from the banking agencies and the money centers, "Relieve the market from this depression; do something." They say if we agree that these obligations of the Government are to be paid in gold times will change. Who has asserted that they will not be paid in gold?

The bankers and brokers told us in 1893 that the repeal of the Sherman Act would bring good times. Now they say, "Issue gold bonds, increase your national debt, destroy the greenback and Treasury notes, and the good times promised in 1893 will come."

Mr. President, the times will be better only when this Government gets on a bimetallic basis and when the world gets on the bimetallic basis. I do not think that German bimetalists would be encouraged if the intelligence should flash across the ocean that we had declared that all our obligations should hereafter be paid in gold. It may strike the Senator from New York that it would be encouraging to Balfour, Goschen, Gibbs, and others in England to have us go to a gold basis so strong and sure that we never could get away from it; but I do not believe it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Colorado of course does not wish to misstate what I said. I said, coupled with the other portions of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking about the other portions. The mere brutum fulmen, the mere idle declaration of a desire for bimetalism coupled with the declaration by law that we do not desire it and will not have it, goes for nothing. I repeat what I said when the Senator was out, that I am justified in saying it was not intended to go for anything. It is an effort to satisfy somebody who does not believe that this country should be put upon a gold basis. It is an effort to satisfy the people that making our payments by law payable in gold is in the interest of silver, but it will deceive no one.

Mr. President, I will not go over the condition of this country. Its financial condition is worse to-day than it has ever been in our history. Since 1893, when the Senator from New York was fighting for silver, as he tells us, and fighting for prosperity by way of the repeal of the Sherman Act, there has been a steady decline of all the products of human labor, and labor itself has on an average in this country fallen 23 per cent during the two years. Silver has fallen with everything else. Instead of going up, as the Senator declared it would, it has steadily gone down, and with it has gone down every product of the country, every result of labor, and the wages of labor.

The New York Tribune the other day in an article upon the condition of the country declared that the bonded securities of the railroads in this country had shrunk in two years more than a thousand million dollars. Five thousand million dollars on the face are worth a thousand million dollars less than when the Senator by his herculean efforts secured the repeal of the purchasing clause in the Sherman Act. The products of the factories and mills of the East are worth less to-day than they were then. Cotton is worth at least 2 cents a pound less than it was worth then. Wheat is worth 15 cents a bushel less than it was worth then.

Mr. President, when will this depreciation stop? The savings banks in this country hold $1,700,000,000 belonging to the laborers of this country, money that they have been accumulating, some of them for thirty and forty years. The savings of these people are now held by the banks largely in the securities that are depreciating. A recent statement of the savings banks of the country shows that they hold in their coffers only 8 per cent of their liabilities. The balance is invested in all sorts of securities, very largely in railroad bonds. In the judgment of men who are familiar with this subject, if the savings banks to-day should be called upon to liquidate they could not pay 50 cents on a dollar. Many securities that they took at nearly or quite at par have fallen one-half, and some even more than that.

And yet there is no effort being made by this Administration to bring the country back to the prosperity that will appreciate those securities, that will make it possible for these great corporations to liquidate their debts and pay them in full, if the holders require it, unless the increase of the public debt be considered an effort in that direction. I do not consider it such. There will be an end of this some day. There will be a breakdown and a breaking up, and when that comes, in my judgment, silver will get its inning, and the men who have stood here and elsewhere and advocated a system the logical and inevitable result of which was to bring about the conditions I have described will find themselves face to face with an enraged and outraged American public.

Mr. President, no man can claim that he was in ignorance of what would be the result of our legislation. Many men on the floor of the Senate declared that the repeal of the Sherman Act would lower prices and produce less opportunities for labor, less production, and less consumption. The advocates of repeal denied it. The men who have insisted upon the return to the bimetallic system for the last fifteen years in this Chamber have predicted that just what the condition now is would come upon us. The commission appointed in 1876, headed by Mr. JONES of Nevada, predicted with the tongue of a prophet just exactly what a continuation of the financial system of the country then in vogue would bring this country to as to prices, and particularly did he point out what would be the result of the railroad investments in the United States.

A night or two ago I took up a statement of all the great railroads in the United States that had heretofore been considered gilt-edged securities, securities in which the widow put her money, securities in which the trustee put his ward's funds by order of court and by the approval of everybody. Mr. President, you can take the whole line, including those that have remained above par, and the depreciation is more than the New York Tribune gives it, 18 per cent. Some of them that were gilt-edged have gone into the hands of receivers. The Norfolk and Western, a few days ago regarded as a valuable investment, is in the hands of a receiver and practically bankrupt. Thirty per cent of all your railroads in the country are in the hands of receivers and are practically bankrupt, and many more on the verge of bankruptcy.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Colorado state to the Senate how many of those went into the hands of a receiver after 1890 and before 1893?

Mr. TELLER. A good many of them did, but the great majority of them after March, 1893. I do not say it was because we have a Democratic Administration. I am not making that point. I am making the point that the financial condition of this country that has been coming on us gradually year by year for the last eighteen years has brought us to this deplorable condition. I will admit that it was intensified and aggravated by the conduct of the Administration touching the tariff and touching finances generally, but it would have come under any Administration, the wisest that could have been possible, if they continued in the same financial rut that their predecessors had been in.

Mr. President, if the Senator from New York is correct, and the President made the best loan possible, you have not only destroyed the credit of railroads, but you have destroyed the credit of the United States. As I said before, you put the United States below Egypt, below Ceylon, below Fiji, and below Jamaica, for the Jamaica 3 per cent bonds are worth $1.11.

Oh, Mr. President, the credit of the United States is not impaired or destroyed. The people of the world know that we are able to pay our debts; and they know more than that, that we intend to pay them. They know we are in a fight on this financial question, but that, whether a man is a silver man or a gold man, we are all striving to maintain the parity of silver and gold, and that bimetalism simply means a parity to be established by law between gold and silver. Open your mints to coinage and you will hear hear no more about maintaining the parity. The very fact that you open your mints will maintain the parity. That is the world's experience. If the world shall come to that, as it may, then we will, of course, come to it, but if it does not, we ought to come to it without waiting for any other government or people.

Mr. President, I shall not further detain the Senate from the consideration of the bill which is properly before it, but may return to this subject at another time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KYLE in the chair). The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, it is proposed to strike out from line 9 to line 12, inclusive, as follows:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $15,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. What is that amendment? What has become of the prior amendment on page 15?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that amendment was passed over for the time being.

Mr. PLATT. All of these amendments were passed over for the time being. When we go back, why not take them up in order?

Mr. CALL. To what amendment does the Senator from Connecticut refer?

Mr. PLATT. To the one on pages 14 and 15.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut as to the order in which the amendments shall be considered.

Mr. STEWART. I inquire what was done with the amendment which was last read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment on page 22 was the one then under consideration.

Mr. STEWART. Has that been stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to strike that out has been agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. No, sir; I did not suppose it was stricken out. The Senate did not understand what was done with it.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know what was done with it.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain to him.

Mr. STEWART. I am in favor of striking it out.

Mr. CALL. All the committee amendments were agreed to except those that were reserved, the first of which is the amendment in respect to irrigation. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] asked to return to the amendment of the Appropriations Committee on pages 14 and 15, in respect to the Bureau of Animal Industry and the appropriation therefor. It is an amendment recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. STEWART. Before the amendment in regard to irrigation passes out of consideration I wish to know what had been done with it. I am in favor of striking it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada that the committee amendment is to strike out the appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART. Has that amendment been agreed to?

Mr. CALL. That amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BATE. I will state that on yesterday evening I happen to know (having been in the chair at the time when the particular amendment was reached on page 22) that it was the consent of the Senate that it should be passed over, and at the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who had the bill in charge, it was so passed over. There was no action whatever taken upon it.

Mr. CALL. That is correct.

Mr. STEWART. Is it before the Senate now?

Mr. CALL. It is not.

Mr. STEWART. It will be called up afterwards, I suppose?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand that we are now considering the amendment on pages 14 and 15?

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Connecticut asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the amendment on pages 14 and 15. The committee amendments, as I understood, were agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no; they were passed over until to-day.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

Mr. VEST. I want to offer an amendment if we take up the amendment on page 15.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest that we begin with the first amendment which we reach which was not disposed of in the reading of the bill, so that we may take them up in their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. VEST. The one on pages 14 and 15.

Mr. CULLOM. The first amendment not disposed of yesterday was the one in relation to meats, and the next will be as to irrigation; then will come the amendment in relation to soils and grasses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment as modified is, on page 14, after line 22, to insert the following:

Provided, That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of all live cattle the meat of which, fresh, salted, canned, corned, or packed, is intended for exportation to any foreign country, at such times and places, and in such manner as he may think proper, with a view to ascertain whether said cattle are free from disease, and their meat sound and wholesome, and may appoint inspectors who shall be authorized to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such cattle and meat are found, and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any fresh, salted, canned, corned, or packed beef, being the meat of cattle killed after the passage of this act, for exportation to and sale in a foreign country from any port in the United States until the owner or shipper shall obtain from an inspector appointed under the provisions of this act such certificate that said cattle are healthy and their meat sound and wholesome.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

Mr. PEPPER. I beg pardon of the Senator from Missouri, but I should like to know where that amendment comes in.

Mr. VEST. At the end of line 18, on page 15; but I propose to modify the amendment. I move to strike out the word "such," at the end of line 17, and insert "a," and then I move to strike out the words which were inserted following the word "certificate," in line 18, and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 17, page 15, of the committee's amendment, before the word "certificate," it is proposed to strike out "such" and insert "a;" and after the word "certificate" it is proposed to strike out "that said cattle are healthy and their meat sound and wholesome," and insert "that said cattle were free from disease and that their meat is sound and wholesome."

Mr. VEST. That follows the language in the preceding statute, and makes the meaning clearer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I said yesterday that I should make the point of order on this amendment. I think this morning that I ought to do it, but since the matter has been so much discussed in the Senate, which discussion, perhaps, was out of order when a point of order was pending, and as the amendment has been further amended, I shall not insist on my point of order, but let the matter come directly to a vote in the Senate as to whether the amendment shall be adopted. Before that is done, however, I wish to say a single word about it.

I think this amendment will work great trouble if adopted. I think there are two classes of people in this country who will be clamoring at our doors for the repeal of this amendment if it shall be adopted: First, the small packers of meats, salted, dried, or canned for exportation. The second section refers, I think, only to beef. There are a great many persons who are now salting some portion of the meat which they do not sell in their home market, who dispose of it in foreign countries. This legislation will prevent that because those persons buy their beef, and certain portions of it they salt. It will be impossible for them to furnish a certificate that the animal from which the beef came which they have salted was inspected before slaughter as intended for exportation. I know of several such establishments in my own State. This legislation will cut them off entirely from their export business, not very large to be sure in comparison with the great meat exporters, but still an honest business, and one which is important to them.

But, second, the great firms engaged in the business of slaughtering beef will find that this amendment will come home to plague them. It will result in having every animal inspected before slaughter or in a destruction of their business of exportation of salted, dried, and canned beef.

Mr. President, when the prior law was passed, in 1891, salted, canned, corned, and packed beef were left out of the law purposely because it was understood then to be entirely impracticable to put them in. It is just as impracticable to-day. No person engaged in the killing of beef cattle kills a single animal for the export of all the meat which the animal furnishes in a salted, canned, corned, or packed condition. When cattle are slaughtered for export they are slaughtered for the fresh meat, the quarters to be exported, and it was with a view to that that sections first and second of this act were adopted in 1891; but when it comes to salting, canning, corning, and packing the meat, the whole animal is not disposed of in that way.

The canned meat, the corned meat, the salted meat, and the packed meat are portions of the animal which are not otherwise disposed of. I believe that to be true in the great canning establishments as well as in the smaller canning, salting, and packing establishments. So this legislation being adopted, hereafter it will be impracticable to send any salted, canned, corned, or packed beef abroad, unless the whole animal is used for that purpose. It is impossible with these great slaughtering establishments, where they slaughter 10,000 head a day, to have every one of them inspected before slaughter, or, if such an inspection takes place, it will not be of the slightest value; it will be a mere farce. But every one of those animals which are thus slaughtered may have some portion of them salted, corned, canned, dried, or otherwise packed. So the person who engages in the business of canning, salting, corning, and packing beef anywhere in the country will be obliged, in order that it may be exported, to trace every piece of meat which he puts into the salt, every pound of meat which he puts into the can, to an animal which was inspected previous to being killed, upon the statement that its meat was to be exported.

Mr. President, if the agriculturists of the West and the meat packers of Chicago, Kansas City, and elsewhere wish to do it, I imagine the smaller men who are engaged in this business up in my section of the country can stand it as well as they, but it is utterly impracticable; it can not be done, and it never will be done, unless the law is so enforced as to practically cut off the business entirely.

Having said that much about it, I do not propose to say anything more in relation to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the same objection which he urges against the pending amendment is not equally applicable to the law as it now stands? For example, in section 2 of the act approved March 3, 1891, we have this language:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of all live cattle the meat of which is intended for exportation to any foreign country, at such times and places and in such manner as he may think proper, with a view to ascertain whether said cattle are free from disease and their meat sound and wholesome, and may appoint inspectors, who shall be authorized to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such cattle and meat are found, and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any fresh beef for exportation to and sale in a foreign country from any port of the United States until the owner or shipper shall obtain from an inspector appointed under the provisions of this act such certificate.

This applies to fresh beef.

Mr. PLATT. Exactly.

Mr. PEPPER. In what respect will the suggestions of the Senator apply to the pending amendment if they do not apply to the existing law?

Mr. PLATT. I must have failed to make myself understood. I said when we passed that law we did provide that cattle which were intended for exportation should be inspected, that when cattle were to be slaughtered and their meat exported in a fresh condition, quarters of beef, we did provide that the cattle under those circumstances should be inspected. We did not put in canned, corned, and salted beef, when killed, because we found it to be utterly impracticable.

Mr. PEPPER. I concede that there is some difficulty in the way of the smaller packers, the individual packers who are doing work upon a small scale, so small indeed as that the business will not justify the employment of inspectors; but most of the meat which is exported, the great body of it, perhaps as much as 95 per cent of it, and I do not know but more, comes from these great packing, slaughtering, and canning establishments, where they have inspectors regularly employed and under certificate.

Mr. PLATT. Is there any canning establishment where the animal is killed and all of the meat put into cans or all of it salted?

Mr. PEPPER. No.

Mr. PLATT. Then it is only a portion of each animal which is to be canned or salted; and therefore it will be necessary to inspect every animal that is killed.

Mr. VEST. I think if the Senator from Connecticut had given any attention to this matter practically, he would not insist upon that position. The meat of certain animals in the great packing houses at Chicago is used exclusively for canning.

Mr. PLATT. All of the meat?

Mr. VEST. All of it. For instance, the cattle that come from Texas, "the Long Horns," as they are termed on the market, always sell at the lowest price; they are lean cattle, have very little fat, and are used exclusively for canning. The distillery-fed cattle and the cattle that are fed upon corn by large farmers in Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and the other Northwestern States are used almost entirely in the domestic market in the United States, or are shipped to England, that country being almost exclusively our market abroad for the better class of corn-fed and distillery-fed cattle.

But if you go into the packing houses at Chicago you will find the canning establishments separate and distinct from the rest of the concern. You will find the canning business carried on in Mr. Armour's great establishment, but it is just as separate and distinct practically as to its operations as if it belonged to another party and was in a different place.

Another remark of the Senator from Connecticut strikes me with amazement. He says that when the original law was passed, which I believe I had myself the honor of writing in 1891, we left out salted, canned, and cured meat deliberately and for a purpose. On the contrary, it was my impression, and I so stated to the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Colman, who then occupied that position, that I believed the second section of that act covered all cured and canned meats, because it said—

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of all live cattle the meat of which is intended for exportation to any foreign country.

As a lawyer I believed then, and believe now, that a fair construction would include all of that meat in any form whatever, but the courts in some parts of the country disagreed with me, and the Secretary of Agriculture the other day called our attention to the fact that under the legal construction put on this act by some of the judges it did not include canned, cured, and smoked meats; that, under the nomenclature of the trade, they were classified differently from the fresh meat, and that when you spoke about cattle and their meat, it was only construed by traders and exporters to apply to fresh meat.

Mr. PLATT. And because the words "fresh beef" are used later in the act.

Mr. VEST. But I refer now to the section in relation to "all cattle, the meat of which is intended for exportation."

Mr. PLATT. Where the act speaks of their going on a vessel, it says "fresh beef."

Mr. VEST. It is true the act did use the words "fresh beef." In the third section we intended to provide for the meat that was used in the United States and exported from one State or Territory to another, and that was to be examined; not only the live cattle that were exported from one State or Territory to another, but the products of those cattle. The question has been raised whether that language would not apply to canned meat.

The Senator from Connecticut was kind enough to tell us that we are injuring our trade and our producers in the West. Mr. President, we will take the chances on that. I want to say to that Senator very emphatically and distinctly that I think I know what the cattle raisers of the West want. I have not consulted the canners, the proprietors of those great establishments in Kansas City, Omaha, and Chicago, but I know that the cattle raisers of Missouri, above all things, want every suspicion removed in regard to the wholesomeness and soundness of their meat.

Mr. STEWART. Because they want a market.

Mr. VEST. Because they want a market and want a higher price. If we can export our cattle without a suspicion as to the wholesomeness and soundness, either as to the fresh meat or the canned goods, we increase the price abroad and in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. But I understand that the fine cattle of Missouri are not used for canning purposes. It is only the inferior cattle of Texas which are used for canning purposes. So it does not seem to me that the agriculturists of Missouri can be much interested.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may be allowed to correct the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, Texas beeves are not now brought to the Omaha packing houses at all.

Mr. PLATT. The statement was made by the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Nebraska should correct him.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then I beg to correct the Senator from Missouri. It has been a long time since Texas cattle have been brought to the packing houses at South Omaha for packing purposes.

Mr. VEST. I do not speak of Omaha. I speak of Chicago. Texas cattle come to Chicago, and are used there almost exclusively for canning purposes.

I wish to say, in reply to the last observation of the Senator from Connecticut, that we bring a large quantity of Texas cattle into Missouri, feed them during one summer, and then carry them to the Chicago market. All the cattle we raise are not corn fed and not of the first quality, by any means. Some of the counties in my State produce the very finest cattle; others do not; but the people bring in the Texas cattle—the Long Horns—and feed them one summer or one winter, as the case may be, the statute of our State prohibiting their importation except during certain months, and they are sold—not what you might call fat cattle or distillery and corn fed cattle, but they still are in very good order, considering their breed.

We are interested in this matter because the market is affected by the prices of all grades of cattle. When the price of beef goes up, it goes up almost altogether without distinction as to its classification, and when it goes down it is the same way.

I want to say emphatically that what we desire in the West is to remove any suspicion as to the soundness of the cattle or meats we have for sale.

Something was said here yesterday about Germany's demands. I never heard of any demand from Germany, and never heard any intimation from Germany in regard to any such legislation as this. This legislation is instigated by the demand of the cattle growers of the West, and the Secretary of Agriculture suggested these amendments, and they were submitted to him before they were brought to the Senate. I think I am authorized to speak for the cattle raisers of Missouri, if not of the entire West, in regard to this question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, after the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] had secured the amendment of this proposition so as not to put any restrictions or limitations with respect to exportation upon the existing stock of prepared meats in this country, I was inclined to withdraw all opposition to this measure, because I conceived that it was undoubtedly desired in the interest of healthy meat for exportation principally, and I could not see that any harm would be done with reference to meat designed for home consumption; but, thinking upon the subject overnight, I am not inclined to favor the amendment. I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] does wisely in withdrawing the point of order and allowing the Senate to decide the question upon its merits.

I am not so far convinced of the wisdom of the amendment as to be willing to vote for it. I shall vote against it, unless something that may be hereafter said in the argument shall convince me that I ought to change my mind.

The original act of March 3, 1891, was drawn evidently with a great deal of care. It is an act the purpose of which is plain and praiseworthy, and the intention seems to be admirably carried out in the act itself. There is no difficulty about it. It provides that live cattle the fresh meat from which is intended for exportation shall be inspected; that is, live animals and the carcasses of those animals, including sheep and hogs intended for interstate transportation, shall be inspected before they are killed, and where the Secretary of Agriculture may deem it necessary after they are killed. These provisions are all plain, straightforward, and intelligible, and the act, I have no doubt, has proved to be capable of easy enforcement.

But now there is a proposition that the same requirements shall be adopted as to salted meat and canned and cured meat that the existing law provides as to carcasses of live animals intended for transportation abroad, or for transportation from one State to another. I do not believe such a law can be satisfactorily put in operation. I believe the law ought to be allowed to stand just as it is; that a statute ought to be brought forward and discussed and tried as a separate measure, and that the present scheme of the Senator from Missouri ought not to be adopted, which proposes in the reenactment of a section intended for fresh meats alone to now include all these prepared meats.

The practical difficulty which I see will exist is the one that has already been stated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I can not state it any more clearly than he has done. The dealers in meat in the large market houses of the country will be unable to salt meat so that it can be exported. The dealers in meat products in a great market house, who do not kill their own animals but who purchase their meat, use it for different purposes. They sell it at retail. Wholesale dealers cut the meat up and sell it, and every day in every market house in the country a very considerable amount of fresh meat not sold is salted down. I have no doubt the products of salted meat prepared in this way and under these circumstances is very large, not large as compared with the whole meat product of the country handled by the great slaughterers in the principal places of the country, but large enough to be entitled to protection against the discrimination which will be made under the operations of the bill—the discrimination that meat so salted shall not be exported, and shall be deprived of the export market. That will inevitably be the result. Where a dealer in meat in a market house salts down 1 barrel, 2 barrels, 3 barrels, 5 barrels, or 10 barrels of meat a week and holds that salted meat until an opportunity is afforded for him to sell it, he is going to have meat which can not be sold for export.

There will be upon the markets of this country two kinds of salted meat. There will be the salted meat of the great packing houses, which will have the certificates required by law and which can be consumed at home or be exported, and there will be another kind of salted meat which will have been salted in the way I have described, by the middlemen or by the small dealers, which can not be exported, which will have upon it the stigma that it can not be exported, and as to which the producers of that meat can not produce the certificates required by the proposed statute. I am sure that will be the result. To what extent the same remarks will apply to meats canned in small establishments I do not know, because it is possible that no meats are canned except in large establishments where the certificates can be obtained by the canners.

Mr. PLATT. May I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to state to the Senator from New Hampshire that an entirely different system of inspection has been prepared for pork and bacon intended for export than is now proposed here for canned beef, corned beef, etc., intended to be exported. In the case of pork and bacon inspection is made at the place of packing. The inspection is not made of the animals before they are killed, but of the pork and bacon at the place of packing. That was included in the law because all the small packers throughout the country came and said that unless it was done their business would be ruined or destroyed. I do not see, if we must have an inspection of salted beef and corned beef and canned beef, why it can not be made at the packing house rather than where the animals are slaughtered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the statement of the Senator from Connecticut now confirms the view he expressed, that the act of 1891 was limited in its operation because it was deemed impracticable to include canned goods within the purview of the act. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] disclaims that reason because he said he drew the act himself and knows that no such purpose entered into the minds of the framers. It is the act which I have praised as being drawn with care, and yet there has been found a court in the country which has differed with the Senator from Missouri in his construction of the act. I suppose the Senator has yielded to the decision of the court in that respect.

The act ought not, in my judgment, to be extended upon an appropriation bill in the way it is proposed to extend it. My instincts tell me that there will be trouble in its operation; that you can not take up a statute from which all these prepared meats, salted, canned, corned, or packed—and there is now to be added cured meats—were carefully excluded as the preparation of ham and bacon was carefully excluded, and include all these prepared meats by simply writing their names in the body of the original statute. It will be found impracticable in operation, or else it will be found to be oppressive in operation, in my judgment.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. Two Senators appeal to me. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey first.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to ask the Senator how, unless inspection is made, we are going to have it understood on the other side of the water where our meat products go that we are shipping for-sign countries pure, healthy, wholesome meats? If you intend to eliminate from the inspection a portion of the products, how can we introduce our meats with a certainty that we are not sending them diseased meats?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will answer the Senator by asking whether he proposes to inspect any more carefully or by any better system meat for the Germans to eat than meat for our own citizens to eat.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at all. If the Senator will turn to section 3 of the act he will find there that an inspection is required of all cattle and all animals intended for interstate commerce and for consumption within any State or Territory or the District of Columbia. If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me just a moment—I do not wish to take up much of his time—I will state that 90 per cent of all the animals slaughtered even in New Hampshire or Connecticut come from the extreme West. If the slaughterer wants his cattle inspected for export they may be inspected in Chicago or Buffalo or Boston. If he wants them inspected for interstate commerce they may be inspected at any of those places, and if inspected for home consumption it answers every requirement of the inspection for foreign trade. It is an inspection, and he has the certificate of the inspector that the cattle are healthy. As to hogs and other animals, as a matter of course there has to be a microscopic examination after the animals are killed.

I see no reason why a slaughterer of cattle in the State of Connecticut should not have an inspector, if he wants one, to make a second inspection of the animals, or to inspect animals which have come in from the immediate surrounding country and have not been anywhere within the reach or the purview of an inspector appointed by the Government at the large inspection places. I see no reason why that slaughterer should not have an inspector, appointed by the Government, if you please, if he is willing to pay for it and it is of sufficient advantage to him.

Mr. PLATT. I agree that I am not familiar with all the details of slaughtering cattle, but are all the cattle slaughtered in Chicago inspected?

Mr. McPHERSON. Necessarily they must be inspected if intended for export or for interstate commerce.

Mr. PLATT. That I know, but are all the cattle inspected there?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. VEST. Yes; all the cattle.

Mr. PLATT. Ten thousand head a day?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know whether the cattle which are killed for the Chicago market are inspected. That is a matter which would come under State inspection laws. They may be inspected by State inspectors. I do not suppose the Government of the United States pays an inspector to inspect the condition of cattle which may be slaughtered in the city of Chicago for the use of the people of Chicago. But if the cattle come East to Connecticut they are inspected, and more than 90 per cent of the entire product consumed by the Senator's people in their establishments in New England are inspected at some one of these inspection points and carry with them a certificate. They are tagged, as the saying is. That is the process by which they are known. All that it is necessary to do is for the owner of the cattle to make affidavit to the fact that the cattle were inspected in Chicago, that they are the identical animals, and I do not suppose a clearance would be refused in such a case. If, however, it were done, if a clearance were not granted, a large establishment in the Senator's State, and certainly you can not expect to provide facilities and inspectors for each one of the small ones, could easily at their own expense have an inspector appointed by the Government to inspect the animals.

The Government can not be expected to have an inspector located at each one of the slaughtering establishments, hundreds of them being in a single State. The attempt on the part of the Government of course has been to send each animal across the ocean with a certificate that the animal came from the districts of the country where there were no infectious diseases, and also that there was no disease among the animals, in order to quiet apprehension upon the other side of the water as to the condition of the meat.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from New Jersey is well informed on these subjects. I wish he would state whether there has been any rejection of our canned meats abroad by reason of the fact that it had no certification.

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes; I think there has been rejection of our canned meats.

Mr. PLATT. I had not heard of it.

Mr. McPHERSON. There has been, I think, quite recently. At all events, there has been an inspection of our canned meats in which it was said to have been discovered that there was trichina in the hog; but whether that is a truthful report I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. I do not speak of that instance.

Mr. McPHERSON. But one thing I understand it has done, I will say to the Senator; it has tended very materially to interfere with the trade of some of the large operators who have been supplying the French and German market with canned meats for army and navy purposes. I think, however, that the inspection is being very perfectly made, and of course all kinds of excuses are given. If a single animal was found to be diseased in any way it would be sufficient cause perhaps for rejecting a great many others. I think the present Secretary of Agriculture is giving the matter personal attention, and is trying in every way possible to convince the people upon the other side that our meats that go there are wholesome and healthy. Certainly if you would permit a portion of the animal to go without a certificate you are injuring the general business very materially.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall be allowed to have a vote on this question.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a very important question. If the Senator from Florida will withdraw this general legislation on an appropriation bill of course I will waive any remarks on the subject.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from New Hampshire does not intend to allow the bill to pass I do not know what we shall do in the matter. This amendment is evidently one that is going to be insisted upon. It is not in my power to withdraw it if I desired to do so. I hope the Senator will allow the amendment to be acted upon one way or the other.

Mr. CHANDLER. No point of order is made on the amendment. The amendment is being fairly discussed. I did not understand the remark of the Senator about my allowing the bill to pass. Will he repeat it?

Mr. CALL. I mean this evening. It is very obvious that if we continue the discussion very long we shall not get through with the bill this evening.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, we shall.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know how that may be; but if the Appropriations Committee insist upon legislating on an appropriation bill and the provisions are to be voted upon by a yeas-and-nays vote of the Senate, they ought to be fairly discussed. I think if the bill passes as it has been framed either by the Senator from Missouri or the Appropriations Committee there is going to be trouble and complaint, and I intend for one to stand clear of the complaint. The shoulders of the Senator from Missouri may be broad enough to carry all those complaints; mine are not.

One thing is certain, Mr. President. The curers of pork and bacon, the men engaged in salting pork and bacon, refused to submit to the act of 1890. They refused to submit to a system by which they would be compelled to have their animals inspected while alive, and also obliged to submit to a post-mortem examination of the animals before they could proceed with their business of curing the pork and bacon.

Mr. PLATT. That is, the earliest act.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him if he does not think that every Senator on this floor is prepared to vote on the amendment now, and to remind him of what he knows quite as well as I do, that two weeks from next Monday the Fifty-third Congress expires, and of the additional fact that a majority of the great appropriation bills have not yet been considered by this body?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the country is anxiously waiting for this Congress to expire two weeks from now.

Mr. HARRIS. And I am anxiously waiting to see the public business progress and be disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. And the country will have quite as much relief when the Congress does expire as it had when the tariff bill which the Senator from Tennessee conducted to a successful passage last summer became a law.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I wish, not in an offensive way, to resent any suggestion that there should not be proper and full discussion upon important subjects of legislation, which, to use the language of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, are dumped on appropriation bills. The idea seems to be that we are to go all through a Congress and not bring forward bills for legislation, and then at the last moment, when the appropriation bills are under consideration, bring all the business of the session and put it or attempt to put it on appropriation bills. We have a sundry civil appropriation bill coming up here within a few days, and I venture to say that there are 200 amendments, most of which are matters of legislation which ought to have been passed in separate bills, proposed to that sundry civil appropriation bill.

When that is the practice of Congress, what are we expected to do? Are we expected to sit still and let all such matters of legislation pass in that way in five minutes or without any discussion or examination at all? It seems to me that this practice had better be stopped, even if we do take the time to discuss properly the measures which are proposed on appropriation bills. There has not been a quarter of the discussion on this proposed legislation that there would have been if the bill had been presented in the Senate, as it ought to have been presented, as an independent matter of legislation. Whether we get through the appropriation bills at this Congress or whether we do not get through with them, I think when measures of this sort are put without notice on appropriation bills we must not be expected to let them pass without fair examination and discussion; and no suggestion that the appropriation bills must go through ought to be listened to for the purpose of allowing such measures as this to pass without proper examination.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Connecticut feels ready to carry his resentment to the point of debating each and every appropriation bill and each and every item of it to the extent of defeating half of them, as a Senator representing a sovereign State he has the right to do it. He will do it upon his own responsibility.

Mr. PLATT. I do not propose to carry any resentment into the discussion of any of these provisions, but I wish to say now that when matters of important legislation are put upon appropriation bills which I think ought not to pass without discussion, which are brought into the Senate in this way, the first notice that they are to be taken up being the printing of the appropriation bills, reported only a day prior to the time when they come before the Senate, it would be a failure of duty to let them pass simply because they are upon appropriation bills.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I quite agree with the suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that it was wrong to have this legislation upon these appropriation bills; but then since it is here we have to deal with it. It has come from the committee in the shape in which we find it. Yesterday evening this particular subject was up, and after being discussed perhaps as long as half an hour or an hour it was resumed again this morning. Certainly ample time has been had.

Mr. CALL. More than an hour.

Mr. BATE. For more than an hour, I am informed, it was discussed; perhaps two hours; I can not tell how long. This morning we have had it under debate now for some two hours, I believe. It is a little singular that we have had such a sudden transition in discussion on this very point in this appropriation bill from gold and gold bonds to canned beef. It has been a wide range and sudden jump. The object, however, of this discussion is to get at what is right. I have not interposed any objection to it, but there has been a very liberal line of discussion indulged in on both sides of the Chamber touching the question. Having discussed it fully, why can we not get a vote on the immediate question? After having listened to much talk on the subject I can hardly see where the difference is between those who have been indulging in the discussion. We all agree upon the fact that we ought to so legislate as to put a guard around the shipment of all meats that are for foreign consumption. Here at home in the States our police regulations can govern it except as to that which comes directly under interstate traffic.

Now, that has been provided for in this very section, and also the shipment of meats for foreign consumption has been provided for here. It is high morals for us to do this, and to say that healthful food shall be sent abroad for our German cousins who trust us upon a question of good faith. If we must have the cans stamped, every single provision is made here in this section, it seems to me, to put proper guards around it, so that there can be no mistake after it gets to Germany, England, or elsewhere that it has undergone the proper inspection here before being exported. I am informed that the Secretary of Agriculture has used the very greatest vigilance in so doing, and if occasionally something of the kind has occurred in which they found objectionable meat in a foreign country, it is very rarely, and a great deal too much has been made out of it. But I believe the object of every Senator who has been discussing this question is simply to throw those guards around it. I insist that the section does throw those guards around it. Now, Mr. President, no point of order has been made in regard to its being general legislation, and it is before us without such objection. Then it should be in the best possible form and I think that it is. I will read one part of the section:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of all live cattle the meat of which, fresh, salted, canned, corned, or packed, is intended for exportation to any foreign country.

This shows that it is guarded by this section and that there will be no danger under its operation of trouble or even suspicion in a foreign market. It is good policy as well as good morals and good legislation for us to have enacted into a law something of this kind. I might disagree, perhaps, in regard to the propriety of this legislation under certain circumstances, on the constitutional question as to where and when jurisdiction, as between the States and General Government, attaches; but it is here, and we must deal with it.

No objection has been made to it, no point of order having been made against it, therefore we ought to deal with it frankly and fairly, and throw every possible guard around it in order to give credit to our meat product when it goes abroad. It is good morals, as I said, and it is good finances for us to do that thing.

I can not understand the exact point made either by the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to this particular amended section. They have offered no amendment to it. They have not proposed to strike out or to insert; indeed they have presented no amendment whatever. Now, what the objection to it is I can not see. If their object is to protect the meat that we ship abroad, and let it go there in a wholesome and healthful condition, they have it in this very section here, and as that is our general object I think we ought to allow it to pass.

Some criticism is made upon it, I believe, by those two Senators because perhaps there are some small places where inspection can not be had and small amounts—such dealers would hardly ship abroad—and if they did so desire that is a matter of detail altogether. The carrying out of these details will be left entirely to the Secretary of Agriculture, and if his agents fall short of doing their duty make it known to him, and I give a guaranty that he will, with his usual vigilance, have it attended to properly. So there can be no sound objection to it on that ground, and I hope there will be no further trouble about it and that the section as amended will pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who, I see, has gone out of the Chamber, for the time neglecting the public business, approve of the remarks of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], who has taken occasion to debate the bill at sufficient length to suit himself. It is not everyone who has the quickness and the fluency of the Senator from Tennessee, and he is able, therefore, to conceive and to express his ideas with the rapidity with which the Senator has spoken in the middle of my speech. I was endeavoring to say that I think there is danger in this proposed law. I had almost finished.

Mr. BATE. I must ask pardon. I did not understand that the Senator from New Hampshire had the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. BATE. I did not, or I should not have interjected a speech in the midst of his.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should have yielded to the Senator from Tennessee if he had requested it.

Mr. BATE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator is a model of courtesy, and did not intend to interrupt me; and on the whole I think my speech is the better for having had his interjected into it.

I said, Mr. President, that this is a dangerous bill. The Senator from Tennessee asks why not move to amend it? There is no need of moving to amend it. The Senator has himself perfected it. It is a simple question whether we can apply the same rules of inspection to salted, canned, and cured meats which we can apply to the inspection of live animals whose carcasses are to be transported abroad or to be sold at home. I say it can not be done without driving the business of salting, curing, and canning meats into the hands of the great establishments of the country.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will be brief; because we want to get on with this bill, and to get through with it to-night, if we possibly can.

Mr. CALL. I wish to ask the Senator if he desires that the carcasses of animals which are slaughtered in this country and packed on farms or elsewhere than in the great packing establishments shall be allowed to be shipped to foreign countries without inspection? Is that the Senator's object?

Mr. CHANDLER. My object is not to provide that meats put up upon the farms shall be exported without being subjected to the provisions of this proposed act, because the act itself has a provision in it that it shall not apply to the products of the farm. I am for protecting the middleman, the small dealer in meats, who may salt down his meat, or possibly a person who cans or otherwise cures meat which he wants to put upon the market, and as to which he may desire the same privilege of exportation that belongs to the meats which are thus prepared by the great packing houses of the country.

Mr. CALL. Then, if the Senator will allow me, I submit to him that that object is already provided for in the act as it stands without the amendment. All sorts of meat, canned, smoked, salted, dried, or otherwise, that are to be exported to any foreign country are in the act, without the amendment, required to be subject to that inspection. I think if the Senator will carefully read the act without the amendment he will find that to be the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. What section does the Senator read from?

Mr. CALL. I have the whole act in my hand. The first section—

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is quoting some section to me.

Mr. CALL. The first section provides, as the Senator has already said, for live meat, for cattle exported on the hoof. The second section provides for "live cattle the meat of which is intended for exportation." That has already been explained.

Mr. CHANDLER. That applies to fresh meat.

Mr. CALL. That has already been explained; and it has been decided in one or two places to apply to fresh meat. The only other meat besides fresh meat is canned, salted, dried, or smoked meat; and I asked the Senator the question if he desired any canned, salted, or smoked meat of any kind to be exported to foreign countries without inspection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Most certainly not.

Mr. CALL. The Senator says he does not. Very well. Then this amendment simply provides that which the Senator desires, that all salted, canned, dried, smoked, or any other kind of meat to be exported to foreign countries shall be inspected.

Mr. CHANDLER. While it is on foot; while it is alive; and that is what I object to.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; the second section provides also—

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it is going to be very difficult, I assure the Senator, to inspect a can of meat while it is on the hoof, so to speak.

Mr. CALL. Now, I want to show the Senator that he is mistaken about that. If he will allow me, I want to convince him that all he desires is already provided for in the act and in the amendment. The second section provides for "live cattle the meat of which is intended for exportation." The Senator says that is only fresh meat, meat that has just been killed. The amendment provides for that difficulty. It says it shall not apply alone to meat that is fresh killed, but also to canned meat and the product of meat that is killed. The Senator says he desires that to be inspected. Very well, the amendment provides for that.

The third section provides that the "cattle, sheep, and hogs which are subjects of interstate commerce and which are about to be slaughtered" and their carcasses shall be inspected, and whenever necessary a post-mortem inspection made. That is for interstate commerce, for our own people.

The fourth section provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make the rules and regulations for the "examination of the carcasses and products of all cattle, sheep, and swine found to be free of disease and wholesome, sound, and fit for human food," and that they "shall be marked, stamped," etc., after such inspection. That includes all dried, canned, fresh, salted, or other meat which is to be used for our own people in the interstate commerce of the country.

The fifth section makes it "unlawful for any person to transport from one State or Territory" to another "the carcasses of any cattle, sheep, or swine," etc.; and the sixth section provides for "official certificates of the sound and wholesome condition of the cattle, sheep, and swine," etc., showing that all these several classes of meat are intended to be provided for in the existing act, both the cattle on the hoof and the cattle just killed, the meat of which is intended for exportation or for interstate commerce.

I submit to the Senator that when you come to the meat to be consumed in the States it provides that the act shall not apply to any cattle killed, or meat canned, dried, smoked, or salted that is prepared by any farmer for use in the State. So that all the Senator desires is accomplished in the act and the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me? I desire to move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Nebraska—

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. CHANDLER. For what purpose?

Mr. HARRIS. For the purpose of an adjournment.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator had asked me a little more mildly I should have said I did not know the purpose for which the Senator from Nebraska asked me to yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nebraska stated his purpose in his request.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had the misfortune not to hear him.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did the Senator from Nebraska state his object?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nebraska stated his object in his request, and I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he yields for that purpose?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to hear first from the Senator from Nebraska. Did the Senator ask me first to yield in order that he might make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should not have yielded if I had heard the Senator make that remark.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the Senator from New Hampshire does not yield for that purpose, I take it.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a parliamentary situation I leave the Chair to deal with.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CHANDLER. I prefer not. I think the debate on this bill should go on and the bill be disposed of to-night.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the suggestion of the want of a quorum the roll must be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. COKE. I desire to state that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is detained at home by illness.

Mr. McLAURIN subsequently said: I wish to state that at the time of the call of the Senate a few minutes ago I was temporarily absent from the Chamber. I desired at that time, had I been present, to state that my colleague [Mr. GEORGE], who was not in his place, is confined to his room by sickness. He being the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I wish this statement to go on record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am sincerely desirous of finishing this appropriation bill to-night, and if Senators will not interrupt me I shall state in a word my objection to the bill as it now stands.

The existing statute provides for the inspection of live cattle the fresh meat from which is to be exported, as a condition of exportation. That is intelligible, that is sensible, that is a law which it is easy to carry into execution. The proposition now is, that no salted beef, that no cured beef, that no canned beef shall be exported unless the live animal from which that meat comes has been inspected while it is alive and a certificate of that inspection is furnished as a condition of exportation. I say that while it is easy in practice to trace the carcass of fresh meat which is to be exported back to the live animal under this system, it will be found to be utterly impossible to trace the meat which is canned and is salted back to the live animal from which it came, and the law will be found either impossible of execution or it will be found oppressive, and will put the whole business of salting, curing, and canning meats into the hands of a few large packing houses in this country.

Mr. President, the persons engaged in this country in the business of salting pork and bacon have resisted the imposition upon them of this original law, and have secured in the existing statute of August 13, 1890, a provision that the inspection of salted bacon and pork intended for exportation shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture at the place where such meats are packed or bought, and that the inspection of such meats shall also be made at the place of exportation, if an inspection has not been made at the place of packing.

What we ought to have is precisely the same privilege for salted beef and canned beef which the law now gives to salted pork and bacon. There ought to be an inspection of it at the place of packing; there ought to be an inspection of it at the place of exportation; and it should not be required that as to these classes of cured and preserved meats, in order to allow them to be exported to a foreign country, there should be a certificate that the live cattle from which the meat came were inspected under the law before they were killed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 18, the Committee on Appropriations propose to insert:

Also, that section 4 of said act be so amended as to read as follows: "SEC. 4. That said examination shall be made in the manner provided by rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and after said examination the carcasses and products of all cattle, sheep, and swine found to be free of disease and wholesome, sound, and fit for human food shall be marked, stamped, or labeled for identification as may be provided by said rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Any person who shall forge, counterfeit, simulate, imitate, falsely represent, or use without authority, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy any of the marks, stamps, or other devices provided for in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, of any such carcasses or their products, or who shall forge, counterfeit, simulate, imitate, falsely represent, or use without authority, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy any certificate or stamp provided in said regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. I move to insert at the end of the section just adopted what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment just adopted the following:

The Secretary is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may decide to be necessary to prevent the transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, of the condemned carcasses or parts of carcasses of cattle, sheep, and swine, or the edible products of the same, which have been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act. Any person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such slaughterhouse, abattoir, or meat curing, packing, or canning establishment, or any employee of the same, that shall willfully violate any rule or regulation made pursuant to this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. PEPPER. I will say to the Senator from Florida who is in charge of the bill that the provision which I have sent to the desk has the approval—not only the sanction, but the approval—of the Secretary of Agriculture. The matter was given to me in the form in which I present it to the Senate by a gentleman connected with the Department of Agriculture, who came officially for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLATT. I am somewhat embarrassed by the suggestion which was thrown out by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] a little while ago, that we were discussing this bill too long, and therefore I will simply say to the committee which will have this matter in conference that I hope they will not permit anything to become a law which makes it a crime, punishable by imprisonment, to violate a regulation which the Secretary of Agriculture chooses to make.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he strike out that portion of his amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. That may be done.

Mr. VEST. It seems to me that section 5 of the act of 1891 covers this case.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator think it covers it clearly and fully?

Mr. VEST. I think so. I would, however, suggest to the Senator that he ought to put into his amendment, instead of the words "parts of carcasses," or after those words, the words "or products thereof."

Mr. SQUIRE. Products therefrom.

Mr. VEST. "Or products therefrom"—either.

Mr. PEPPER. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri this modification.

Any person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such slaughterhouse, abattoir, or meat curing, packing, or canning establishment or any employee of the same that shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act.

Instead of "rule or regulation of the Department." Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PEPPER. I modify the amendment in that way, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is, on page 22, after line 8, to strike out all down to and including line 12, as follows:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $15,000.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend the text proposed to be stricken out by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "eight," so that the appropriation will be "$8,000" instead of "$15,000."

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that the Senator from California withdraw his amendment, because this appropriation is proposed to be made in another bill, placing the subject under the direction of the Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. ALLEN. An amendment has been offered to increase the appropriation for irrigation surveys to the amount of $25,000.

Mr. WHITE. I do not care to withdraw the amendment, because I think we had better take what we can get on this bill.

Mr. STEWART. I think that the entire provision had better be stricken out. Such appropriations have hitherto failed of their purpose. It amounts to very little now, and I think it had better be left out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] to amend the text of the bill proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

Mr. PEPPER. What is the amendment of the Senator from California?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, on page 22, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "fifteen" and insert "eight," so as to read:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the clause.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that appropriation will be stricken out, and the amendment of the committee agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I have information indirectly that some provision is likely to be made in some other appropriation bill for irrigation purposes. While that may be true—and I have no doubt it is true—I do not wish to be placed in the position of consenting to any proposition which will strike from either existing or proposed legislation any future benefit to the irrigation interests of the Western people. In our own State our people have recently organized themselves into irrigation associations. There are county societies, and then there is the State society, and only yesterday I received a communication from the president of the State irrigation society. It has the sanction and the support in one way or another of the entire legislative and executive influences of the State. Furthermore, all through the semi-arid region of the Western country associations are being formed for the purpose of advancing the interests of agriculture by irrigation.

In our own State we have a large body of land which is fruitful in all the productive features of the best soil in the world. In 1891 we had the largest crop of wheat which has ever been produced by any single State of the Union, and, with a single exception, more wheat, perhaps, than was produced that year or any other year by any single nation under the sun.

In 1892, in passing over that splendid agricultural region, I saw scattered all about over the landscape stacks of wheat beyond number. I now recall an instance where there were 28 wheat stacks on one farm, and that, too, in the semi-arid region, showing what can be done there when we have water when we need it.

In the eastern part of the State, as our record in the State University shows, the annual rainfall is about 36 inches, or an average of 3 inches to the month, one-third of which is amply sufficient for the production of any of our cereal crops, provided, only, we could get it just when we needed it. That is the great difficulty in the western part of our State and the same character of country extending on to the mountains and to the north and the south of us. What we are trying to do is to secure some artificial means by which we can gather and retain the moisture which falls and, if we can, supplement that from some natural sources from above or below the surface.

Last year, when we were discussing the tariff question, when I asked that a part of the duty might be retained on salt for the benefit of the men engaged in the manufacture of salt in my State, that was denied me; when I asked that a small portion of the duty on wool might be retained as some benefit and protection to the woolgrowers of my State, that was denied me; and when I asked to have the bounty which was provided by the law of 1890 for the benefit of our sorghum-cane growers, I was denied that.

I can see but one outlet for our farmers now, Mr. President, with all these advantages taken away from us, and that is in this field of irrigation. So I do not want to be placed in the position of retiring from any proposition which looks like favoring us in that direction. Hence, while it may be true that there is some provision to be made in another appropriation bill for the purposes of irrigation, I am opposed to striking out this provision.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate at this hour in any lengthy discussion of this question, but I am very much in sympathy with the sentiments uttered by the Senator who has just taken his seat.

The State I have the honor in part to represent is very much interested in the development of certain counties which are comprised in the arid district. There are experimental operations going on and there are already large developments in the line of irrigation, particularly in the great valley of the Yakima River, and our people desire information, and desire to acquire that information from the best sources as to the modes of agriculture by irrigation. I believe that in speaking for the people of my State in this respect I am also representing the wishes of the people of many other States of the Union.

As to whether this provision or a provision of the same purport is to be incorporated in any other bill, I am not fully informed. If that be true, I would not insist upon the retention of the paragraph here; but I feel that the development of agriculture by means of irrigation is a very important matter, and that we ought to give it full and careful attention. Even if some representatives of the Agricultural Department, as has been stated, have been inefficient, we still ought to provide the money and put efficient men in charge of the work. I do not know that it is true that they are inefficient, but it has been suggested that nothing much has been done in regard to the proper development of information on this subject.

Mr. WHITE. A great deal has been done.

Mr. SQUIRE. There is a great deal to be learned in regard to the sources of the water supply and the proper methods of utilizing the supplies of water for irrigation purposes, the proper methods of conducting the water, and proper methods of ascertaining as to whether it is practicable and feasible to proceed with the irrigation system in developing a country agriculturally, and, as I stated before, I do not feel willing to let this appropriation be omitted if it is not contemplated that the same subject shall be fully covered in some other bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I am heartily in favor of a liberal appropriation for the purpose of an irrigation survey of all the arid lands of the country. The people whom I represent in part in this Chamber believe in that, and I am willing to do anything that is in my power to procure a sufficient appropriation to make a survey, and then supplement that at the proper time with the development of irrigation in the arid regions; but it is altogether unwise, in my judgment, to separate these appropriations and to place a portion of the work under the Agricultural Department, to be conducted by a distinct bureau, and another portion under the charge of the Director of the Geological Survey.

The Director of the Geological Survey has a corps of competent men, skilled and scientific, to attend to this business, who have made researches and surveys and gauged waters of the country. An appropriation was made last year of $12,500 for that purpose. There is an intention, if possible, to increase it to $25,000 this year, and I think without any doubt we can increase it. I submit to the Senator from Washington if it would not be wise to put this entire appropriation under the direction or at the disposal of one man.

Mr. SQUIRE. I agree to that. But there are Senators on this floor who are very much opposed to the Geological Survey. I recollect very well one Senator who sits near me, who, in his argument before the Senate, was disposed to overthrow the entire Bureau having charge of the Geological Survey. If he sees fit to fight the proposition we may not get the appropriation in that bill. What I desire to insist upon is to have the appropriation in some act of this Congress so as to provide for a proper study of the subject. I believe it to be wise to have it in connection with the Department of Agriculture, because the gentlemen connected with the Geological Survey are not supposed to be familiar with many of the elements of the subject as to what soils might be the best to be benefited by irrigation and what are the distinctive qualities of the soils; but the Agricultural Department is furnished with a corps of able men, chemists, and others, to determine as to the value of the soils and what kind of soil should be improved.

It seems to me that the proper Department to govern the investigation is the Department of Agriculture, rather than to have it placed under the Geological Bureau. Still, I would rather have it under the Geological Bureau than not have it at all. There are some reasons, perhaps, why the Geological Bureau could best deal with it. So far as relates to geological formations, there ought to be cooperation between the Agricultural Department and the Geological Bureau. I do not suppose the scientists of the Agricultural Department devote themselves to questions of geological formations, as to what the underlying strata may be, the different kinds of rock or clay for the retention of water in basins, so as to permit water to rise when artesian wells are sunk to this height or to that or the other. That can best be determined by the Geological Bureau. But when it comes to the application of water to soil, then I judge that the Agricultural Department is best fitted to pursue that class of investigations.

It seems to me that in order to give the full usefulness to the Agricultural Department which it deserves and which the people of the United States have the right to expect from it, we should arm it in every direction, to a reasonable extent, with men and money to carry on its investigations fully and properly for that purpose. I believe the people of the country should be enabled to learn what soils are best adapted for certain purposes. Take sugar. We know, and experiments made at the agricultural college in the State of Washington have shown, that we can raise beets for the production of sugar as profitably and as favorably in the State of Washington as can be done in any other part of the Union or in any other part of the world. We show the highest percentage of saccharine matter in our sugar beets. I believe there should be some provision made for investigations of this most important subject under the supervision of the Agricultural Department of the United States for the benefit of all the people. The people of the United States should produce their own sugar. No better place exists, in my judgment, for the raising of sugar beets than exists in the valley of the Yakima and the great valley of the Columbia, in the State of Washington; and I should like to see experiments made with reference to determining such questions. Therefore, unless we have some assurance that we are going to get a full and adequate appropriation in some other bill, I desire to appeal to the Senate to retain this provision. And I shall be equally desirous of a suitable appropriation for the promotion of researches by the Geological Bureau with a view to the ascertaining of the sources and amounts of supplies of water for irrigation purposes; of the best modes of preservation and use of those supplies for such purposes; of the proper places for the borings for artesian water, and all similar information which may be useful on such lands as I have described in the great basin of the Columbia, which possesses a rich and deep volcanic soil ready to respond with bounteous crops whenever the supplies of water already existing in that region can be properly managed and utilized.

Mr. President, we ought to appropriate the full amount of $15,000 in this bill as it came from the House, and then appropriate the $25,000, or whatever the sum may be, for the geological surveys in its place in the other bill referred to.

Mr. CALL. Let me suggest to the Senator that the pending bill will be in conference, and if this provision should be put in some other bill it can be adjusted there.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say a single word before a vote is taken on the amendment. I am impressed with the idea, representing a State not very largely interested in agriculture, that the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that I will allow the original text to stand if he will not make a speech.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not quite satisfied with the suggestion of the Senator from Florida. I desire to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. So do I.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not delay the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee never delays the Senate one-tenth part as much as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. It is proper for me to say that the amendment reported by the committee would test the question when the bill goes into conference. If the clause was stricken out it would still be subject to restoration.

Mr. HARRIS. According to the statement now made by the Senator from Florida I am quite in agreement with him. I desire that the amendment of the committee shall be agreed to, and then it does put the whole subject in conference. But if the Senator from Florida retires from the amendment of the committee there will be nothing for the conference committee to confer about.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know precisely the attitude which the Senator in charge of the bill occupies at the present time upon this question.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will state that the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken in one respect. The amendment was modified on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] by inserting $8,000 instead of $15,000.

Mr. HARRIS. That is right; but still, if that amendment to the text of the bill has been agreed to, and the committee amendment shall be disagreed to, the only question that can go to the conference committee will be whether it shall be an appropriation of $8,000 or $15,000.

Mr. CALL. That is all the Senator from Tennessee desires?

Mr. HARRIS. It is not quite all I desire, because I am opposed to the whole appropriation.

Mr. STEWART. So am I.

Mr. HARRIS. Therefore I want to test the question and at least record my vote. Though it may be a single vote in the Senate, I wish to record it against the whole appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, beyond a question the parliamentary argument of the Senator from Tennessee is sound. That is precisely the attitude in which I should like to have this matter. As I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator from Florida, I am opposed to striking this clause from the bill. The investigations under the appropriations made heretofore and that are proposed to be made this year in matters of irrigation, are in the hands of a very cultivated and capable gentleman who has given much time to the investigations, and who, in my opinion, has done a great deal for agriculture in this country. He has not confined his operations to the great West, but has done something for New Hampshire as well in instructing our people to irrigate their lands, so that we with our sterile and rocky soil in New England may be able to raise a larger amount of agricultural products per acre than we have been doing in the past.

The appropriation is not large. It is in the hands of the Agricultural Department, where I believe it ought to be, and the suggestion that we should take a work of this kind from the Agricultural Department and put it into the hands of the Geological Survey seems to me preposterous, to say the least. The gentleman now having charge of the matter has sent out 280 plans during the last fifteen months to farmers in all parts of the country, instructing them how to lay down irrigating plants so as to make their land more valuable. Thousands of letters have been sent out, most of them to the West, it is true, to Kansas, Nebraska, and other Western States, not many to Nevada, some to New Hampshire, and some to the South. It seems to me it would be a wrong policy to be inaugurated now to take this appropriation out of the hands of the Agricultural Department and put it, even if it is proposed to be put, as I have no knowledge it is, into the hands of the Geological Survey.

I hope we will stand by the bill in this particular as it came from the House of Representatives. I do not know that we need the appropriation of $15,000 which the other House voted. I am quite willing to stand by the lesser amount which has just been adopted upon the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. But let us at least stand by the text of the clause as it came to us in the bill from the House of Representatives and enable these important and valuable investigations to be continued, to the end that agriculture, not alone in the great States of Washington, Kansas, and Nebraska shall be advanced, but that the farmers of New England as well shall have some bureau of the Government to which they can go and get information to enable them to cultivate their lands to better advantage than in the past.

I hope the amendment as proposed by the committee, if it is put to a vote, will be rejected, and that we will stand by the appropriation of at least $8,000 for this very desirable purpose.

Mr. WHITE. I suggested $8,000 and made a motion to amend the bill to that extent and to that effect because upon investigation I found that $8,000 was the amount which was represented in the report of the officer in charge as being necessary for this particular part of the Bureau, and I considered it adequate to cover the subject. I am unwilling to consent to its being stricken out. I dissent in toto from the statement of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that it is entirely useless. I do not so consider it. I have taken pains to look the matter up, and I will state in a moment the result of the inquiries I have made.

But so far as the Geological Survey is concerned, there seems to be an attempt, or there is some evidence that there will be an attempt, to extend its jurisdiction to a great many quarters to which it should not be extended. There has been a little intimation that it is proposed to abolish the offices of register and receiver and have a geological professor there. A geological professor is also to dictate the duties of the surveyors-general, and now we are told that it is necessary to have a geologist in order to know just how to irrigate land in order to raise beets. Possibly it will be a subject for geological attainment to find out precisely whether a certain quality of sugar beet is useful for that purpose.

It seems to me that so far as the practical operations of irrigation are concerned, or the carrying on of a bureau designed to procure information for the advancement of irrigation, it should be under the control of the Agricultural Department. The very profession of a geologist indicates entire unfamiliarity with anything so modern as the sugar beet. I can not understand why gentlemen who should be deeply versed in the lore of ages long gone and who should be competent to read from various rocks the story of their creation and their antiquity, should be able to come down to modern days and give us information upon subjects of agriculture. True, a geologist may do that as a relief from the cares and vicissitudes attendant upon his professional life, but certainly he does not make a business of anything so modern as that which grows nowadays.

The amendment has reference to the support of a board of irrigation inquiry. Hearing nothing as to what had been done in this direction, I have ventured to look over the matter and called for a statement of what had been done. The Senate will understand that this is an office called the "Office of Irrigation Inquiry," connected with the Agricultural Department. During the last fifteen months there were 1,327 descriptive letters written from the Department, each containing instructions or plans, or both, for the improvement of land by irrigation methods. Then, to accompany those letters there were 280 plans forwarded. The letters and plans were distributed as follows: Texas, 100; Kansas, 472; Nebraska, 531; the two Dakotas, 36; Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Virginia, Florida, New Jersey, New York, New Hampshire, 34; New Mexico, Arizona, California, Oregon, Nevada, and Utah, 145. The instructions contained in those letters covered the whole range of irrigation farming, and so on.

Besides that the office sent out through the arid regions of the West 4,000 letters to as many persons asking information regarding irrigation farming, and to a majority of the letters answers were received, giving information valuable upon the subject.

Then, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the office has not confined its operation merely to irrigation in the West, where it has heretofore been deemed to be solely applicable, but has sought to ascertain, and I think with good results, whether even in regions such as were described by the Senator from New Hampshire it is not possible to apply such methods. I am informed that the result of those inquiries is such as to lead the office as well as parties who are well informed and personally interested to believe that great good will come from it.

I have myself some familiarity with the subject. I live in a part of the United States where irrigation has been carried on to a greater extent and with greater success than anywhere else, and perhaps from personal observation I know more about it than anyone else in this Chamber. I am unwilling to consent to the elimination of the reduced appropriation of $8,000. I think it is little enough. I believe that to strike it from the body of the bill at this time would be unwise, and I am unwilling to wait and find out whether in the course of our geographical progress we may not conclude to make an appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. SQUIRE. May I ask the Senator from California one question in order to elucidate the point he has made?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. SQUIRE. Is it not true that it may be advisable that an appropriation shall be made for an investigation through the Geological Survey to determine the best methods of preserving the water supply and as to the various basins, the rock formation, and questions with reference to the water supply? That is a class of inquiries altogether foreign to the inquiry to be made under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WHITE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SQUIRE. That seems to be very proper.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SQUIRE. Even if we are successful to-day in retaining this paragraph, with its appropriation, we ought not thereby to be precluded from an effort to obtain an appropriation for the support of the investigations through the Geological Bureau. I do not want to be estopped from an effort in that direction. I wish this explanation to be clear now, that each of the two bureaus is essential, one to determine the sources of the supply of water and the methods of supporting that supply, and the other to determine the character of the soil to be benefited, and whether it is advantageous that there should be processes of irrigation undertaken in connection with a particular locality.

It seems to me, if I understand the Senator from California correctly, that he is in favor of the latter, but not in favor of it to the exclusion of the former. If I am correct I should like to have him assure me so.

Mr. WHITE. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Washington. Of course there is a branch of the subject to which the attention of the Geological Bureau might well be directed, in the matter of ascertaining whether it is advisable to sink wells in certain regions, and so on. I might mention a thousand instances where the learning and ability of gentlemen versed in the subjects referred to by the Senator from Washington would be desirable. I am not, I trust, understood as doing anything here, either by my record or conduct, that will operate as an estoppel of any character upon me regarding an appropriation under the Geological Survey or included within the appropriation for that Bureau. On the contrary, when that matter comes before us I shall be in favor of such an appropriation. But I am referring now to this particular item, which relates solely to agriculture. It is a small item, and perhaps we have already talked about it to such an extent that, computing our time and the expense to which the Government is put by reason of the discussion, we have expended more than the item amounts to. We have already voted to insert $8,000, and I trust the Senate will not recede from the position taken a few minutes ago.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, what is the exact question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator from Florida who has the bill in charge that we now adjourn. We have worked all the week, and it is now after 5 o'clock Saturday evening. I do not think anything is to be gained by continuing in session to-night. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw the motion to adjourn for a few moments.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that we shall agree to vote on the pending amendment at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to address the Senate for five minutes on one of the proposed amendments. I do not intend to waste time.

Mr. CALL. Then I ask unanimous consent that we shall commence to vote on the amendments at that time, limiting the debate to five minutes. There are only two or three other amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is satisfactory. I want only five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to object to that arrangement, if it is understood that I shall have the right to offer an amendment after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. CALL. Certainly, with five minutes' debate.

Mr. LODGE. That is all I want.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the whole Senate can agree to the five-minute rule, but I should not be willing to agree to vote absolutely without debate.

Mr. ALLEN. At the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky I withdraw the motion to adjourn and will move—

Mr. CALL. The agreement is understood as unanimously agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 18, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 16, 1895.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

Bartholomew Kennedy, of Iowa, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa.

POSTMASTERS.

Timothy J. Williams, to be postmaster at Richwood, in the county of Union and State of Ohio.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 16, 1895.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to a House resolution dated January 5, 1895, information as to the amount of lands patented to the land-grant railroad companies since May 26, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

BRITISH-VENEZUELA BOUNDARY DISPUTE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 252) relative to the British-Venezuela boundary dispute, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know what there is in this.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "boundary limits in Guiana" and insert the word "boundary."

Strike out all of the preamble.

Mr. REED. What have we to do with this?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This resolution passed the House and went to the Senate. It simply expresses the sense of the Congress of the United States that this boundary dispute, which has been in existence since 1827, and is affecting the commerce of this country and which involves a palpable violation of the Monroe doctrine, ought to be settled by arbitration. That is all there is in the resolution. The Senate struck out what they considered some superfluous words and the preamble, and I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ISOLATED TRACTS OF PUBLIC LAND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 4052) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the sale of isolated tracts of public land, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 2, strike out "$2.50" and insert "$1.25," so as to make the clause read, "not less than $1.25 per acre."

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. The Senate amendment explains itself. It simply reduces the price of these lands from $2.50 to $1.25 per acre.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2455. It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to order into market and sell for not less than $2.50 per acre any isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of the public domain less than one quarter section which in his judgment it would be proper to expose to sale after at least thirty days' notice by the land officers of the district in which such land may be situated: Provided, That lands shall not become so isolated or disconnected until the same have been subject to homestead entry for a period of three years after the surrounding land has been entered, filed upon, or sold by the Government: Provided, That not more than 100 acres shall be sold to any one person."

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some further explanation of this. It looks to me as though some people had gone upon certain unappropriated public lands and were trying to get title to them under this bill.

Mr. NEILL. There is nothing of that kind in it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The public domain of the United States has not depreciated in value to the extent indicated by the Senate amendment, has it?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir; but there are a few isolated tracts of land that can be sold under this bill. They are not subject to sale under the existing law. They are subject to homestead entry, but people will not occupy them under the homestead law. There are a good many such tracts in my own State. On the other hand, there are men who would buy 40, 80, or 100 acres of these lands for use in connection with adjoining farms. This bill as it passed the House fixed the minimum rate at $2.50 per acre.

A MEMBER. That is what it ought to be.

Mr. NEILL. No; because there are some of these lands that are not worth that; but this bill provides that they shall be offered at public sale, and if anybody will give $2.50 or $10 the Government will get that price. The Senate amendment merely fixes the minimum price at a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. PICKLER. Perhaps the gentleman had better explain to the House why people do not take these lands as homesteads.

Mr. NEILL. Because the lands are not worth it.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not because the tracts are not large enough?

Mr. NEILL. No, sir. It is because the land is so poor that people will not make homes upon it; they could not make a living on it.

Mr. PICKLER. But this will apply to a great many tracts where there are less than 160 acres.

Mr. NEILL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And where the land is valuable, too.

Mr. REED. Why did the House make the price $2.50 an acre? If the Senate is right in reducing it to $1.25 an acre, how did the House come to make the mistake of putting it at $2.50 an acre?

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from Maine. I introduced this bill fixing the minimum price of these lands at $2.50 an acre instead of $1.25, as heretofore. About the same time I introduced another bill to increase the single minimum price of all public lands to $2.50 per acre. That proposition has not met the approval of the House Committee on Public Lands. The minimum price now for all the public lands, including those involved in this bill, is $1.25 an acre, and now, since my general proposition has not been approved by the House, and since the Senate has amended this bill so as to put these isolated tracts of land upon the same basis as to the minimum price as the other public lands of the United States, I will not oppose it.

Mr. REED. But why did the gentleman from Arkansas in his bill fix the price of these lands at $2.50?

Mr. McRAE. I did that because I thought the price ought to be $2.50 for all of our lands.

Mr. REED. Then why do not you stand by it?

Mr. McRAE. I have stood by it as far as I could without endangering the defeat of this bill. The other general bill has not been even favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and if it is not passed it would of course be unjust to put these the most worthless of our lands at $2.50 and let the other more valuable public lands be rated at $1.25 per acre.

Mr. COOMBS. Does it necessarily follow that these are worthless lands?

Mr. PICKLER. No. Some of these lands are good lands.

Mr. McRAE. Under this bill these isolated tracts of our lands can not be disposed of unless the area of the tract is less than a homestead is entitled to under the law, and the lands before being sold must have been subject to homestead entry for at least three years.

Mr. PICKLER. This bill, as I understand, allows the sale of tracts of less than 160 acres—tracts, for instance, of 120 or 100 acres. It very often happens that there are fractional tracts which, although the land is just as good as any other, are not taken up as homesteads because the quantity is less than 160 acres. It seems to me that we ought not to sell in this way tracts of more than 80 acres, because tracts exceeding that area might be taken by some homesteader.

Mr. McRAE. That is not probable, and besides no such change can be made in the bill now.

Mr. PICKLER. I believe this is a good bill. These fractional tracts are scattered here and there; and nobody takes them as homesteads, so that they are not doing anyone any good. But I should not like to see any great quantity of these lands sold at the price named.

Mr. McRAE. No land can be treated under this bill as isolated or disconnected until it has been subject to homestead entry for three years. I assume that after all the lands adjoining have been disposed of and settlers refuse to enter for three years that the lands can not be of much value.

Mr. PICKLER. And any tract to be sold must be less than 160 acres.

Mr. McRAE. It must be less than one quarter section, and a full quarter is 160 acres.

Mr. KIEFER. Does the bill specify the number of acres?

Mr. McRAE. It must be less than a quarter section. If there is as much as a quarter section, either full or fractional, the land can not be treated under the bill as isolated or disconnected; and even if the quantity is less than that the land must have been subject to homestead entry for three years. Besides, the lands will be offered at public sale, with a guaranty of the minimum price and fees.

Mr. COOMBS. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the provisions of this bill are not limited to fractional sections in detached positions, but apply to all detached lands.

Mr. McRAE. Less than a quarter section.

Mr. COOMBS. May there not be some valuable timber lands which somebody is trying to get hold of by means of this bill?

Mr. McRAE. If the gentleman had had any experience with timber lands he would know that no person would be satisfied with any tract of 120 acres for timber purposes, and to protect against any abuse in that direction the bill provides that not exceeding 160 acres shall be sold to any one person.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, none of these lands are to be sold until homesteaders have had three years to take them if they want to do so.

Mr. McRAE. That is true, and it is an additional restriction over the old law. So far as concerns the proposed price of $2.50 an acre, I am responsible for that, and still believe it best if it could be made general. But as I have failed in that effort, for the time at least, I will not oppose this. As the Committee on Public Lands has disagreed with me, and the Senate in amending the bill has signified its opposition, I see no chance at this late day of increasing the single minimum price of all lands to $2.50. I admit that it would be wrong to put this class of lands at double the price of all other public lands. If my general proposition should ever prevail these isolated tracts would be covered by it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. NEILL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

WOMEN AS SCHOOL TRUSTEES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1717) to authorize the appointment of women as public school trustees in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. This bill was amended by the House; the Senate has disagreed to the amendment of the House, and asks a conference. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 6 add the following:

"And for this purpose the number of trustees of said board shall be increased from 9 to 11, not more than two of whom shall be women."

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House insist on its amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. PICKLER. What change has been made by the Senate to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Senate has disagreed to an amendment of the House and asked a conference.

Mr. MEREDITH. I should like to know the effect of the action taken by the Senate. Does it provide that women shall be left off this board?

Mr. HEARD. The bill, as passed by the Senate, authorized the appointment of women as school trustees, but put no limitation upon the number.

Mr. MEREDITH. They ought not to be trustees at all.

Mr. HEARD. The amendment of the House, upon which I have moved to insist, limits the number of female members of the board to two.

The motion of Mr. HEARD was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CADMUS, Mr. HEARD, and Mr. ALDRICH as conferees on the part of the House.

SURVEYOR'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 444) making the surveyor of the District of Columbia a salaried officer, and to provide for more efficient service in the surveyor's office, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate and a request for a conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will understand in conference that this is not merely a formal disagreement.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I think I need not say to the gentleman from Maine that whenever I have had anything to do with a conference on the part of the House I have always sought, as I will hereafter, to try to make it express the exact will of the House. I feel assured that the conference committee will be cognizant of its duty to the House and will not fail to observe the action taken by the House with reference to this or any other matter committed to it.

The motion of Mr. HEARD was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. COBB of Alabama, Mr. HULL, and Mr. COOPER of Indiana as conferees on the part of the House.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were referred as indicated, namely:

A bill (S. 2409) granting certain lands in the abandoned military reservation at Fort McKinney, Johnson County, Wyo., to the State of Wyoming for public purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 2576) for the erection of a public building at Paris, Ky.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TURNER of Virginia, for this day, on account of sickness.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 8892) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, for prior years, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I desire to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that I shall ask the House to consider this bill immediately after the naval appropriation bill has been disposed of.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, DARDANELLE, ARK.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8709) for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TERRY. I will state in connection with this matter—

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right of objection until we can hear an explanation of this matter or have the report read.

Mr. TERRY. I wish to state, with the consent of the House, one fact before the report is read.

When this bill was called up for unanimous consent some time ago, objection was made to it by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. After a consultation with him, we agreed upon an amendment which he considered satisfactory and withdrew his objection. When I called it up again objection was then made to it by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but we got together and finally prepared an amendment to obviate his objection, and the bill when so amended will read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8709) for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the circumstances, character, and extent of the damages by United States troops during the late war of the church building and grounds of the Presbyterian Church of Dardanelle, Yell County, Ark., and the actual value of the building and material taken, and report to Congress the result of such investigation.

That is all there is of it. It simply provides for an investigation and report to Congress of the result of such investigation.

Mr. REED. Is the gentleman prepared to make an investigation by the Quartermaster's Department of all cases of that sort which arose in the South during the war? If it is not his purpose to do so, it would seem better that we should not begin.

Mr. TERRY. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me—by order of the Commanding General of the Armies of the United States, approved by President Lincoln himself, in 1863 it was expressly directed that no interference on the part of the military forces should be had with churches or schools—

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. TERRY. But in this case they did tear down the buildings and used them for barracks, as I understand—

Mr. COOMBS. Does not that bring it under the general law?

Mr. TERRY. Well, it has been under such "general" law for all of these years that we have never been able to get anything on account of the damage done. The claim was filed in 1870, as I understand, and I suppose is now in the War Department; and there is no reason on earth why the Department should not make an investigation and ascertain the facts in connection with the matter. They are not asked to make an appropriation, but simply to report their findings.

Mr. REED. That is to say, all you want to do now is to get the camel's nose into the tent?

Mr. TERRY. Well, if the gander has a right to get in I do not see why we should keep it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. My reference to natural history was to the camel, not the "gander." [Laughter.]

Mr. TERRY. Well, I understood you to say you "gander."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to make just this suggestion to the gentleman, that the Second Deputy Comptroller is very handy now in auditing accounts presented of this character where property has been used for the erection of barracks, quarters, etc., which goes to the occupation of churches, schoolhouses, and matters of that kind. The matter has been undergoing an investigation before the committee over which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] presides, in connection with the deficiency bill, and the knife has been used quite freely so far as that class of cases is concerned, with the approval of the gentleman from Texas, and used to cut out all of that class of claims. It seems to me that matter had better be fought out before we, by resolution of Congress or otherwise, journey any further along this line.

Mr. TERRY. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until I have finished my statement.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman wants to establish the principle there is no case where he can better do it than on these claims that come with the blessing of an audit by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and in view of the fact that it will enable us to establish the principle, and in view of the fact that until it is established it seems to me it is an unnecessary and improper expense, and that we should not go further along this line, therefore, while I rarely object to anything in the House, yet for the reasons indicated I feel constrained to object to this.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 8272) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 209) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver condemned cannon to Asher Gaylord Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Plymouth, Pa., and to Eckley B. Coxie Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Freeland, Pa.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2726) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Lexington, Mo.," approved July 26, 1894;

A bill (S. 2365) for the relief of Northup & Chick; and

A bill (S. 2377) for the relief of H. F. Menough, late postmaster at Rock Springs, Wyo.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2595) to establish a life-saving station at or near City Point, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts;

A bill (S. 1813) providing an additional circuit judge in the ninth judicial circuit;

A bill (H. R. 4283) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Cumberland, Md.;

A bill (H. R. 109) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at South Omaha, in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 2337) for the erection of a public building at Newport, Ky.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE.

The following reports of committee were handed in at the Clerk's desk, referred to their appropriate Calendar, and otherwise disposed of as indicated below:

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. MCKAIG, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 915) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN THE CITIES OF WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.

Mr. MCKAIG, also from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the bill (S. 2663) to provide for the erection of a public building in the cities of Winston-Salem, N. C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WARREN C. BEACH.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8715) to place Warren C. Beach on the retired list of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to place on the retired list of the Army, with the rank of captain, Warren C. Beach: Provided, That the said Warren C. Beach shall not, by virtue of such restoration to the Army, be entitled to back, present, or future pay or allowances of any kind whatsoever.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to consider this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York can make a short explanation.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Captain Beach graduated from West Point and served twenty-one years in the Army. Then, being in failing health, and having some business to attend to in another part of the country, being out on the plains, he asked to be retired or to have leave of absence. He did not get an order for either. He resigned, expecting, however, that after he got to Washington and attended to his business he could be ordered before a retiring board. That failed. He is now willing to take retirement, without having any pay for the past or future, but simply placing him on the army list as an officer. There is precedent for that.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I object to that bill.

Subsequently Mr. SAYERS withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole last night be taken up and considered.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I want to know about how long the gentleman thinks that will take?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It will not take over thirty minutes.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. If the gentleman thinks he can get through by 12 o'clock, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] calls up certain bills, which, under the rule, have the right to be considered. The previous question was ordered last night on those bills, which would bring them up immediately after the reading of the Journal, subject in this case, by special order, to appropriation and revenue bills; but appropriation bills do not antagonize them, and therefore the House will proceed to consider these bills.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, were severally considered, the amendments recommended by the committee agreed to, the Senate bills ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed, and the House bills ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, read a third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to Harrison C. Hobart.

A bill (H. R. 6928) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Wear Crawford. (Title amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.)

A bill (H. R. 6901) to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahl.

A bill (H. R. 575) granting a pension to Charity Ann Smith.

A bill (H. R. 7177) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson.

A bill (H. R. 8264) granting a pension to Saloma Mangold.

A bill (H. R. 5565) granting a pension to Joseph R. Brooks.

A bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Wessels.

A bill (H. R. 6646) for the relief of Albert Munson. (Title amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.)

A bill (H. R. 2218) for the relief of John B. Leach. (Title amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.)

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a motion to reconsider the vote by which each of these bills passed, and to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, will be considered as made, and the motion to lay on the table will be considered as agreed to in each case.

There was no objection.

ALEXANDER WILLIAMSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following bill, reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with the recommendation that as amended it do pass:

A bill (H. R. 8099) to increase the pension of Alexander Williamson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the present pension paid to Alexander Williamson, a private in Company H, Second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, during the war with Mexico, be, and is hereby, increased to $50 per month, and the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, directed to have his name placed on the pension roll at such increased pension.

The committee recommended the following amendments:

Amend by striking out the word "fifty" in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five," so as to fix the rate of pension at $25 per month. Also amend by striking out "Commissioner of Pensions," in line 6, and substituting therefor "Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. LOUD. I desire to make a short statement in connection with this bill. It proposes to grant an extraordinary pension to a soldier of the Mexican war, on account of blindness developed forty years after said war. While I do not desire to be specially technical, or to throw myself in the way of the passage of pension bills in this House, I desire to state in justice to myself that I presented to the Fifty-second Congress, and again to the Fifty-third Congress, two bills proposing to pension soldiers of the late war who had served three years, the ground of the application being in each case the blindness of the applicant. I was informed by the committee that it was contrary to the policy of the Pension Office to report bills granting extraordinary pensions in cases of this character.

I am inclined to think that the judgment of the Pensions Committee was absolutely just and proper, because all these cases have been presented to the Pension Office. They have presented all evidence that was possible to connect their blindness with their service in the Army. Now, then, if it is impossible to connect blindness twenty years after the late war with the service, it seems to me that it is much harder to connect blindness occurring forty years after the Mexican war. The only object I have in making this statement to the House is to show that once in a while, if a member has special friendly connection, or is a member of the Committee on Pensions, he can secure a favorable recommendation from that committee and bring his claim before this House.

These matters should be acted on in justice and equity to all. They should be covered by general law or at least there should be no exception made in any case. I will say again, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the position taken by the committee in the two cases that I introduced here and had referred to them was perfectly just, correct, and proper, and that very course, in my opinion, should have been followed in this case. I shall not raise any technical objection to the case, however, but make this statement in justice to, and the cases introduced by, myself.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN J. SHIPMAN.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7076) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of John J. Shipman.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John J. Shipman, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $17,811.96, the same being the amount found by the Court of Claims to be due to the said John J. Shipman from the United States for stone furnished and delivered by the said Shipman to the United States and used by it in the construction of a lock on the Big Sandy River near Louisa, Ky., the said findings of the Court of Claims having been made in a proceeding and trial in said court authorized by resolution of the Senate of the 16th day of January, A. D. 1889, transmitting said claim to the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act approved the 3d day of March, A. D. 1883 (twenty-second volume United States Statutes, 485) and an act approved the 3d day of March, A. D. 1887 (twenty-fourth volume United States Statutes, 506), to be instituted in said court against the United States.

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will ask for the reading of the report, or I will make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The report is three pages long. Without objection, the gentleman may make a brief statement.

Mr. MEREDITH. This is simply a bill to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and to pay a gentleman by the name of Shipman for stone furnished to the United States Government under a contract which has been recognized, the facts all found by the Court of Claims and a certain amount ascertained to be due. This is simply asking the Government to carry out its contract.

Mr. SAYERS. How much does it involve?

Mr. MEREDITH. Seventeen thousand dollars.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I want to look into it before I give consent to its consideration.

Mr. MEREDITH. The question is whether it is a just and proper claim.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. MEREDITH. Is it not too late to object after unanimous consent has been given?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was not given.

Mr. MEREDITH. I thought it was.

MARTHA CUSTIS CARTER.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4756) to grant a pension to Martha Custis Carter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Martha Custis Carter, widow of Samuel P. Carter, late rear-admiral of the United States Navy and major-general of the United States Volunteers, on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and pay her a pension at the rate of $100 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Has that bill been considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RANDALL. It has been amended in the committee.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Has it been considered in Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session?

Mr. RANDALL. No; it has not.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and that gentlemen having reports to file may be permitted to hand them to the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a measure.

Mr. DURBOROW. I ask consideration for a measure that has been reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order, which cuts off requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. DURBOROW. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I have in my hand. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The regular order cuts off everything.

Mr. SAYERS. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order, so as to allow the gentleman an opportunity of having his bill considered.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Then I withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the present, to let the gentleman have an opportunity to go into Committee of the Whole, which is for the purpose of disposing of the caravels.

TRANSFER OF REPRODUCTION OF CARAVELS OF COLUMBUS TO COLUMBIAN MUSEUM, CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1454) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transfer the reproductions of the caravels of Columbus to the Columbian Museum of Chicago.
Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to transfer to the trustees of the Columbian Museum of Chicago the reproductions of the caravels of Columbus, the Santa Maria, Nina, and Pinta, which were exhibited at the World's Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STORER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8665) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the leading features of the bill under discussion have been fully and very eloquently debated, and inasmuch as the Committee on Naval Affairs has determined that, as far as possible, every member of the House shall have an opportunity of expressing his views on this subject, I will confine myself to a very few brief remarks, in which I shall attempt to touch upon certain points that have not hitherto been alluded to.

I desire first, sir, to call the attention of the House to the vast extent of sea mileage under the jurisdiction of this Government. On the Atlantic we have a coast line of 2,732 miles, and a coast line of bays, rivers, etc., to the head of ship navigation of 33,778 miles; making a total of 36,510 miles. On the Gulf coast we have a total mileage of 19,143 miles. On the Pacific coast we have a total mileage of 8,900 miles, and on the Alaska coast 26,376. This makes the total of our outer coast 10,376 miles; bays, rivers, etc., 80,553 miles; making a grand total of 90,929 miles. The population along the coast in the seaboard and lake towns amounts to a grand total of over 16,000,000 people. Along this coast are seven or eight cities aggregating a wealth of between three and four billion dollars. This wealth, sir, is to be protected by war vessels. In the late civil war the number of vessels obliged to be employed was 697, as follows:

Ironclad steamers, coast service.....	46
Ironclad steamers, inland service.....	29
Side-wheel steamers.....	203
Screw steamers.....	198
Sailing vessels.....	112
	588

In 1864, 109 vessels were added, and the Navy consisted of 697 vessels of a tonnage of 510,396, carrying 4,610 guns.

The growth was not confined to vessels. From 7,600 men in service at the beginning in 1861, the number was increased to 51,500.

The aggregate of laborers and artisans employed in the navy-yards was 16,880, an increase from 3,844 previously in the pay of the Government. About the same number was employed in private yards and establishments.

Now, sir, we who are liable—thank God not to a condition of the same kind again, but to foreign attack—have not one single battleship. We have some under preparation and building, but not one ready to defend our coast.

Mr. Chairman, John Adams, contemporaneous with Thomas Jefferson in almost every particular, even to the date of his death, because they died on the same 4th of July at nearly the same hour, said in a letter written to Thomas Truxton in 1802:

"The counsel which Themistocles gave to Athens, Pompey to Rome, Cromwell to England, De Witt to Holland, Colbert to France, I have always given and shall continue to give to my fellow-countrymen, that, as the great questions of commerce and power between nations and empires must be decided by a military marine, and war and peace are determined at sea, all necessary encouragement should be given to the Navy. The trident of Neptune is the scepter of the world.

This advice, given by that great man at that early date, has held good ever since. It is democratic. It is Jeffersonian. Thomas Jefferson and John Adams were contemporaries, and although there may have been a difficulty between them for some years, death came to them at almost the same hour, and we are told that the last words on the lips of Adams were "Jefferson still survives."

Now, Mr. Chairman, having alluded to that affecting historical incident, I want now to allude to another. There is an item in this bill for the repair of that gallant old ship, the Constitution, sometimes known by the name of "Old Ironsides."

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report in support of this appropriation, makes the following statement:

"For many years past this vessel has been used as a receiving ship at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., has been housed over, and only such repairs put upon her as would render her habitable and in condition to float. Her present state is such that if this famous old ship is to be longer preserved as a memento of our glorious past a larger sum of money than that appropriated at the last session will be necessary. In view of the memories which are inseparably connected with this vessel, the Department believes that it would be wise for Congress to authorize that she be repaired and put in such condition as will enable the Department to preserve her indefinitely. Should such an act be passed the old ship might then be brought to Washington and kept at the navy-yard as an object of interest to the many thousands of patriotic Americans annually visiting the capital of the nation."

She was built in September, 1797, and in the early years of the century, when war was imminent between France and the United States, she played her part in defending our commerce. Again, under Captain Hull, she gained a most signal victory over the Guerriere. Later on, under Captain Bainbridge, she achieved a victory over the frigate Java, and afterwards, in the Bay of Biscay, under Captain Stewart, over the two British frigates, the Cyane and the Levant. Her reputation is national. One of her commanders that I have named came from New England. Two of them came, respectively, from Pennsylvania and New Jersey. In 1829, when she was very much dilapidated, according to the reports, Secretary Branch ordered her to be pulled to pieces, but public sentiment ran so high and the people were so much opposed to the destruction of the old ship that popular meetings were held throughout the country and the Secretary was denounced and was obliged to rescind his order and to direct that she should be repaired and put into commission. The poet of Massachusetts, Oliver Wendell Holmes, as you will remember, composed a poem of three stanzas on that occasion which has lived undimmed from that day to this:

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
 Long has it waved on high,
 And many an eye has danced to see
 That banner in the sky.
 Beneath it rung the battle-shout
 And burst the cannon's roar—
 The meteor of the ocean air
 Shall sweep the clouds no more!

 Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
 Where knelt the vanquished foe,
 When winds were hurrying o'er the flood
 And waves were white below,
 No more shall feel the victor's tread,
 Or know the conquered knee;
 The harpies of the shore shall pluck
 The eagle of the sea!

 Oh! better that her shattered hulk
 Should sink beneath the wave;
 Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
 And there should be her grave!
 Nail to the mast her holy flag,
 Set every threadbare sail,
 And give her to the god of storms,
 The lightning and the gale!

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] must surely have forgotten this incident when he made his speech yesterday. That expression of popular sentiment comes from the land of his birth. That poem appealed to the popular American heart and I dare say that every schoolboy has it in his repertoire.

But, sir, the Constitution is not dead. Jefferson did not order the sale of the Constitution. She is still ours, and this bill proposes to expend a small sum of money upon her repair and transportation to the navy-yard in this city, that she may, at the capital of the nation, be looked upon by the nation as one of the great pioneers of our Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested by some gentlemen that instead of the Navy being augmented the gospel of peace should be promulgated. Sir, I for one would gladly hail that state of things. I should be glad to see the sword forever sheathed. I should be glad to see the guns forever dismounted.

But, sir, such things have not been—not since the incipency of Christianity. No, not since the world began. The great Master himself has said, "When ye hear of wars and rumors of wars, be not troubled, for such things must needs be."

Sir, when that day arrives, when the millennium shall be at hand, then will it be a proper time to discontinue our defenses, then shall the lion and the lamb lie down together and all the world be at peace. But, sir, until that time does come this country must maintain her honor and her dignity, and protect the life, liberty, and property of her people. Beneath her flag her people seek to live a peaceful life of freedom, and no freedom can be obtained unless they are in a position to secure and uphold it. [Applause.]

A table giving the miles of coast line which should be protected is appended.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention briefly to some of the items in this bill so as to give the House an opportunity to consider seriously whether we are ready at this day, in a time of profound peace, to enter upon the construction of battle ships and the extension of the Navy in such a way as to lead eventually to an expenditure of perhaps $350,000,000 in the construction of new ships, and whether we shall then be ready to vote annually the enormous sum of money which will be necessary to keep those vessels properly armed, properly manned, and properly equipped. A brief glance through this bill will give us some idea of what must be the expenditure to keep up the Navy as it now exists and to provide for the increased expenditure which will necessarily follow the completion of the vessels already contracted for and now in course of construction.

This is one of the only appropriation bills which in all my experience in this House has come from the committee in such a shape as actually to increase the estimates of the Department. We all know that there is scarcely a Department of this Government that does not make its estimates with a liberal allowance, providing for all sorts of deductions by the committee which is to consider its bills. The Navy Department estimated what would be necessary to meet all its regular and current expenditures for the ensuing year, and yet the Committee on Naval Affairs has brought in a bill which increases the estimates of the Secretary to the extent of $844,927. It has been said that much of this increase beyond the estimates is due to the fact that they propose to build three battle ships and twelve torpedo boats.

An investigation of the bill and report shows that the amount actually appropriated because of this proposed increase in the number of vessels is only $535,629, leaving $309,298 of the increase unaccounted for, except on the general principle of extravagance.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I must beg the gentleman not to interrupt me. My time is limited to thirty minutes, and the gentlemen favoring the bill control nearly all the time which has been allotted to general debate. I am constrained, therefore, to ask that I be not interrupted.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. All right.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, this bill increases the appropriation of last year $5,444,197.14. The naval bill of 1894 as it became a law appropriated $25,366,829.72. This bill asks for $31,807,521.30. Comment seems unnecessary. Can the country, can the Treasury stand an annual increase of five and a half million dollars in the cost of our Navy?

Every new ship finished and put into commission entails a heavy additional expense each year. The Naval Committee, for instance, has increased the appropriation for the equipment of vessels $188,000 because of four or five new ships going into commission during the past year. We are nowhere given a detailed statement of the cost per day or per annum of maintaining one of these great floating palaces; but the cost is enormous.

The committee tell us briefly in the report that the estimates submitted by the Bureau of Ordnance have been increased in the sum of $1,181,081.50 over the existing law. They say that of this sum $150,000 is for a modern battery for the Hartford, $159,558.50 is for a reserve supply of guns, $130,000 for a reserve supply of projectiles, $242,500 for additional torpedoes, and $75,000 for a magazine at Craney Island. I should think the purchase of so many projectiles and additional torpedoes would require additional magazine space. I have heard no reason whatever given for all this additional war material. I also find an item of $500,000 for reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers.

Why, sir, we have no auxiliary cruisers that I know of except the Paris and the New York. It seems to me it would be ample time to enter upon the purchase and manufacture of guns for auxiliary cruisers after we shall have found vessels of that class flying the American flag which we would have the right to take and to use in case the emergency should arise. Until there has been such modification of our shipping laws that American-owned vessels can sail under the American flag, no matter where the vessel may have been constructed, it is not probable that we will have many auxiliary cruisers.

But to return to the increase of the Navy. It is recommended that 2,000 additional men be enlisted in the Navy. This increase is said to be necessary in order to put the new ships already finished in commission. The bill carries an increase of $480,481 to provide for these new men if enlisted. The report states that there will be required on account of ships finished last year the following additional sums: For Bureau of Equipment, $188,000; for Bureau Steam Engineering, $245,000; a total of $433,000, which, added to what it is said will be needed for the 2,000 additional men, will make an annual increase of $893,481, from which, if once authorized, I fear we can never escape.

In these matters we can never go backward. We must continue to advance. I can see no necessity, therefore, for entering upon a reckless expenditure of public money at a time when the receipts of the Treasury are barely adequate to meet our current and necessary obligations.

In speaking of this proposed increase of the Navy, I want to invite the attention of the House to a report which was made by what was known as the naval-policy board, which was appointed, if I remember correctly, in 1883 or 1883, and which reported a general plan for the increase of the Navy. The policy board recommended the building of a total number of 237 vessels—10 first-class battle ships, to cost $58,000,000; 8 first-class battle ships of great endurance, to cost $11,000,000, and so on—the report giving each class and kind of vessel, which I will not consume time in enumerating. The total, as I have said, was 237 vessels, which were to cost a gross sum of $349,515,000. In carrying out in a general way the recommendations of this policy board we have already built and equipped vessels sufficient to maintain all the naval power that we shall need on the high seas for the next quarter of a century.

I do not share the apprehension of those gentlemen who think it essential that in order to preserve the integrity of the Republic and to keep peace within and without our borders we must possess a naval establishment equal to that of the great powers of the earth, either singly or combined. We should reflect what it would cost to indulge in such a luxury. I find from the best information at command that Great Britain to-day has a navy embracing about 275 vessels of all kinds, most of which are constantly in commission. Her annual expenditure for the maintenance of that number of vessels and their proper equipment amounts to $87,000,000. France has 187 vessels, and her annual expenditure upon her navy is about $52,000,000. Germany has 75 vessels, with an annual expenditure upon her navy of $23,000,000. Russia, with 120 vessels, many of them small wooden vessels, spends $30,000,000 per annum upon her navy. Italy has about 91 vessels in her navy, and the annual expense for its maintenance is over $20,000,000. The United States, from the best information I can get, has about 47 vessels, many of which are frequently out of commission, and we spent last year something over $25,000,000 in their maintenance. It is proposed in the pending bill to spend more than $31,000,000 this year in maintaining these vessels and laying the keels of a few others which it is proposed to construct.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to undertake to emulate the example of European nations who are always ready to fly at each other's throats, in their armaments, and who are maintaining them at the expense of their tax-ridden people, we must expect an expenditure which in the near future, if we follow the ratio in this bill, will soon reach fifty to sixty millions annually. That would be an outrageous and an unnecessary burden upon the people of this country. I find that the English navy costs $1,021 per man; our Navy costs $1,500 per man, nearly one-third more. If therefore it costs England eighty-seven millions per annum to maintain her present navy, it would cost the United States three times that sum, or two hundred and sixty-one millions per annum, to maintain a navy as large as that of England to-day. Are we prepared to put this awful burden on our people? If so, for what object? Is any nation threatening to invade our shores? Does our foreign commerce need any such protection? Is it barely possible that this great anxiety for a large new navy may have some connection with the desire for territorial acquisition, so evident in some quarters? Possibly there is some connection between a great navy and the annexation of the Sandwich Islands. Perhaps some ambitious statesmen are dreaming of taking Cuba under our protection. If we are to engage in a war of conquest, we certainly shall need a navy, and the sooner we build our ships the better.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will permit me, in addition to the vessels that have been already constructed how many others are there in process of construction?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The gentleman from Missouri asks a question, and I will answer it with the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee. This bill provides for the completion of every vessel that is now authorized by law. Provision is made in the bill for each one of them in detail.

Mr. WASHINGTON. But that is not the whole of the expense by any means. The gentleman must remember that if it takes $31,000,000 to provide for the vessels already completed and to keep them in commission, it would require a vastly greater sum if the 15 vessels named in this bill be constructed. It will take forty or forty-five millions next year, and will continue to increase. As I said, when once started you can not escape from it.

Our Navy is already amply able to maintain the dignity of the United States, and to protect the rights of our citizens on all the seas. I do not think any further increase necessary at this time. It is a waste of time for gentlemen to figure up the thousands of miles of seacoast line on the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Gulf, and the Great Lakes of the North and then undertake to show how inadequate the Navy is in comparison to that of Great Britain. There is no parallel between the situation of the United States and of Great Britain, and there is no reason for making the comparison.

Why, if we would undertake to place at the mouth of every harbor, inlet, and bay on the coast a great armored vessel, and keep stationed there a fast cruiser, the burden of taxation would be so great upon the people of this country that in ten years we would have a revolution that would sweep any party who favored such a scheme out of existence forever.

I will ask the indulgence of the committee while I go through this bill somewhat in detail and show a few of the enormous sums it is proposed to expend on navy-yards and docks, and matters other than ships.

I find by an investigation of the bill on page 13, under the head of repairs and preservation of navy-yards, a proposed increase of $100,000, and yet while it would seem that that would cover the expenditures in that line, all through the bill, at every navy-yard, an examination will show that there are additional increases proposed, the whole of which swell the appropriation for this purpose up into the millions. That is only a general appropriation on page 13 under that head, but if we go forward and take up each of the yards in detail we will see that there is an enormous expenditure for alterations, enlargements, and additions to these yards.

At the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, for instance, there is an item to which I wish to call the especial attention of the committee for a moment, and that is to construct or authorize the repair of the workshop near the timber dock—$85,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was in the Brooklyn yard myself not very long ago, and on a cursory investigation it seemed to me thoroughly enough equipped to transact all of the business of the United States Navy; and yet this bill proposes to expend the modest sum of $85,000 for one new shop!

It is easy to imagine that before the end of the year they will come back with an estimate of $50,000 or $60,000 to put machinery in that new shop. And I do not select Brooklyn to make an invidious distinction. It was simply for reference. Follow all of these other provisions in the bill relating to yards, and you will find much the same thing. Coming down to the Washington Navy-Yard, we find an appropriation for the extension of the electric-light plant of $5,000. If I am correctly informed, there was an expenditure on this same electric-light plant last year of $15,000. Now, in the name of high heaven, how much of the people's money is it going to take to put proper electric lights in the quarters of the officers, in the barracks and shops and store-rooms at this Washington Navy-Yard?

Again, it is proposed to convert the museum building No. 6 into officers' quarters at an expense of $8,000. Anyone casually investigating the condition of the yard would suppose that there were quarters enough there now to take care of all of the officers who are assigned to duty here; but we must have another large building converted into residences, at an expense of $8,000. It seems to me to be an entirely unnecessary expenditure, or if it is not, the committee reporting this bill should have brought before the House and the Committee of the Whole some specifications showing the absolute need of this great expenditure of public money at such a time as this.

I find again at the naval station at Port Royal, S. C., leaving out other large appropriations for that yard, an item for the construction of a repair shop of $80,000. Now, in the name of Heaven, how many repair shops do we need along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts? Here is a provision also for a dry dock at Algiers, La., at the mouth of the Mississippi River, embodying a total expenditure of $1,250,000. To be sure, this bill only appropriates $100,000 for this dry dock; but that is only "the starter." More will be called for next year.

I stated that this bill was prolific of appropriations for the future and a glance along its pages and its lines will convince any fair-minded man of the truth of this statement.

I find again, for dry dock and naval station on Puget Sound, page 21 of the bill, an appropriation of $280,000. The committee does not tell us what is to be the total cost of this naval station, and all of the other appurtenances thereto belonging, which will be asked of the House in the future. Perhaps a million and a half or two millions of dollars will have to be expended at this point which I understand is within 80 miles of the British line, where a British land force can march in one day and besiege, perhaps seize and destroy, this costly plant.

Sir, it strikes me that if we need a naval station or navy-yard on the Pacific Coast, it should be at Mare Island and not on Puget Sound. There is no necessity that I can discover for any more than one yard, and that should be large enough and sufficiently equipped to care for all our vessels that need repairs in the waters of the Pacific.

I find again, for the naval station at Key West, Fla., there is appropriated in this bill the insignificant sum of $20,000 to buy a lot for a coal shed. Why, Mr. Chairman, I should think that $20,000 would buy several acres of ground in and around the little point of Key West, on the southern end of the Florida coast. But $20,000 is recklessly appropriated, under present conditions, to buy a lot on which to place a coal shed.

Then, when we come down to the bottom of page 21, under the head of the new Naval Observatory, we find that there is asked for quarters for observers out at the observatory, four buildings, which ought to be called residences, to cost $7,500 each, a total of $30,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the committee explain why it is necessary for quarters to be constructed for observers and officers stationed at the Naval Observatory, which will cost the enormous sum of $7,500 each.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill carries an appropriation for four residences at the new Naval Observatory?

Mr. WASHINGTON. If my colleague will read the bill, on page 21, at line 25, at the bottom of the page, he will see the following:

New buildings: For quarters for observers, four buildings, at $7,500 each, $30,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had occasion in the warm months of last year to take a walk out to the Naval Observatory, and after my eyes had been delighted by the magnificent proportions of the beautiful new observatory, which is a structure worthy of this great country, they rested next upon a palatial residence finished in the highest style of modern architectural art. This building I learned had been constructed at the expense of the taxpayers, completed and furnished no doubt at the expense of the taxpayers, as a residence for the chief observer or superintendent of the Observatory. Heaven knows what it cost; but there are few houses in the city of Washington grander in proportion or more beautiful in exterior, and I do not think that in a Republic, under an economical Government, such as ours should be, we ought to erect palatial quarters for army or navy officers who are assigned to the soft snaps called shore duty. I do not object to reasonable residences, to comfortable quarters, but it strikes me that these appropriations go beyond the bounds of reason.

I hear my friend on the committee [Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland] whisper to one of his associates that he cut down the Naval Observatory estimate $50,000. Mr. Chairman, I thank him for that little suggestion, though it was not intended for me.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. WASHINGTON. His remark is proof of the statement I made in the beginning that there is hardly a Department or bureau of this Government that does not estimate for from 50 to 100 per cent more than they know they are going to get, and then if they get 50 per cent of their estimate, they get in many cases more than they have an actual need for if proper economy is practiced. Yet, instead of cutting down the whole estimate of the Navy Department, the Naval Committee has increased it, as I said, about $5,000,000. Of course they must have necessarily cut down an estimate here and there. It would hardly be possible for them to have done otherwise.

Mr. REYBURN. You are opposed to the whole Navy, are you not?

Mr. WASHINGTON. No, sir; I am not. Now, Mr. Chairman, reverting again to the subject of battle ships, I want to reiterate and reinforce what has been said heretofore, that the construction of these large battle ships requires a great deal of time; and naval architecture and the manufacture of guns, both for naval and land use, are so rapidly developing that, in the majority of cases, if we were to lay the hull of a battle ship to-day, before it could be completed it would be changed and modified so that the man who drew the original plan would not recognize the ship of his own designing.

Such is the history of our Navy in every particular. I hold in my hand a report which was made a few years ago by a gentleman now a member of the Senate, who was once Secretary of the Navy, and an active and efficient man in that capacity, the Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER, of the State of New Hampshire, and this document will bear perusal of everyone interested in this subject. He states in regard to a few of our naval vessels, heavy armored vessels, a few facts that ought to be brought to the attention of every member of this House. Mr. CHANDLER says:

It is the experience of foreign navies, up to the present time, that any type of ironclad vessels introduced becomes so inferior as to be almost obsolete for general purposes in a period of about ten years.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Did he give the difference between the ironclad and the battle ships?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes.

This proposition is as true now as it was eight years ago. It is doubtful whether any naval power has a broadside armored vessel even five years old such as it would build to-day when constructing more ironclads.

Our own limited experience is the same. Congress, by the act of August 5, 1882, directed the Naval Advisory Board to report in detail concerning the double-turreted monitors Puritan, Amphitrite, Terror, and Monadnock, "whether any changes in the original plan or plans should be made."

The Board made reports, dated December 15, 1882, January 11, 1883, April 5, 1883, May 31, 1883, and October 25, 1883 (Navy Department Report, 1883, pages 74-84), substituting roller-base turrets for the original style of monitor turrets, and settling the final plans for the completion of the vessels. The Board also says:

"It is easily possible to complete the vessels by taking advantage of the recent developments in armor, guns, and machinery, without making any radical changes in the designs, so that their speed, endurance, battery power, protection, and seagoing qualities shall be fully equal to those of any foreign ironclad of similar dimensions designed previous to 1879."

Congress favorably regarded the reports and plans of the Naval Advisory Board, and March 3, 1883, appropriated "for the engines and machinery for the double-turreted ironclads, in accordance with the recommendations of the Naval Advisory Board, $1,000,000."

Yet such has been the assumed progress of invention and improvement in ironclads that instead of these ships being brought to completion in accordance with the recommendations of the Advisory Board, radical changes are being made, completely depriving them of their special character as low-free-board, revolving-turret ships. The turrets have been taken off the Puritan, so that she may come up higher out of the water, and stationary barbette protection for the guns has been adopted, and they are to be fired from above the rampart and covered only by a steel umbrella, which will be blown away by any heavy projectile and the guns disabled.

Moreover, running between the barbette towers a commodious superstructure has been built on the deck, in order that the officers may not be obliged to endure the discomforts of living below deck, where the crew must live. Whatever may be the real value as a war ship of the once more reconstructed Puritan, she is no longer a low-free-board, double-turreted monitor; and it is clear, if what has been done has been done wisely, that an ironclad carefully designed in 1883 became obsolete before 1889.

And I think, if I am not mistaken, neither one of these vessels is to-day completed. Is that a fact?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. They will all be completed by January, 1896.

Mr. WASHINGTON. None of them is completed.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Oh, yes.

Mr. WASHINGTON. They are to be completed in January in another year. A further perusal shows how materially the plans have been altered from time to time and large appropriations made in consequence of these changes. A plan is adopted, much money is spent, and then the plans have to be all changed and another appropriation asked for.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me remind the gentleman that only in the last session of Congress we had to make a large appropriation to cut two of these vessels in two and make them longer, so as to keep them from turning over.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That is true.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Let me state to the gentleman from Texas that the last appropriation bill carried just what this does, and the gentleman approved of that bill.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I object to all of this coming out of my time.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Monadnock was in the naval review two years ago.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That may be. The Puritan I saw myself, not long ago, lying at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard as empty as an old washtub, and just about as helpless.

Then we undertook the construction of the Maine and the Texas; and I think they have been completed and put in commission. They are not what they would have been if we had waited a little while longer. Yet, Mr. Whitney advertised in the press, and gave a chance to all the naval architects of the world to compete in furnishing plans for these ships. He did not confine himself to the naval architects of the United States.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we ought to go very slowly indeed in a proposition to construct these enormous engines of war, which, when completed, will either lie useless in some navy-yard, to be eaten up by rust, or the plans on which they are to be constructed will have to be changed from time to time during that construction, so that instead of costing $4,000,000 each they will cost $8,000,000 or $7,000,000, and be worthless when completed. I hope that the House is not ready to enter upon the construction of costly ships like these at this time.

No doubt more vessels are wanted by those who take a great interest in the Navy and who have personal reasons for wishing to have a great Navy. I do not propose to question the motives of any member, but gentlemen all know that each year there is a large class of cadets turned out at Annapolis prepared at the expense of the Government for naval life. These young men naturally desire to reach a command in some vessel and an opportunity of obtaining rank and distinction at the expense of the country. If I had it in my power I would so change the law that only a limited number of the cadets would be admitted to the Navy each year. The others, after receiving a thorough training which would fit them for command should the country ever require their services, should be sent back to civil life, where they could join the great army of producers and become useful citizens.

We have already, as a part of the new Navy, a great reorganization scheme pending before the House and on the Calendar—a plan by which it is proposed to put upon the retired list practically the great bulk of the men in the Navy to-day who are of mature age, so as to give the younglings and striplings a chance to force themselves to the quarter-deck. If that bill is carried through and these new ships are built, in every Congress there will be a demand for larger and larger appropriations in order that our young and worthily ambitious officers may sail the seas and parade the greatness of our Navy before an admiring world.

At the outbreak of the greatest war that history has ever recorded the United States had no such Navy as she has to-day, and yet the genius and talent of the American inventor was such that, in a brief space of time, with a comparatively small expenditure of money, the United States got together a Navy which was superior to that of any power on the earth, a fact which the people in the section whence I come learned to their sorrow. It came out of that struggle triumphantly; and if we should become involved in war with a foreign country, we can trust to American talent, to American ingenuity, and American genius to furnish the vessels, the arms, as well as the brave hearts and commanding genius to meet the emergency of that hour. I insist that when this bill comes up for action under the five-minute rule for amendment in the Committee of the Whole these expenditures should be closely supervised and largely reduced. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to print some further extracts from Senate Report No. 174, Fifty-first Congress, first session. I am convinced that they are worth reading, and they bear directly on the subject of battle ships.

I.—THE UNITED STATES OUGHT NOT TO BUILD ARMORED BROADSIDE BATTLE SHIPS.

The time has not yet arrived, if, indeed, it will ever come, for the construction by the United States of the ponderous, unwieldy, and costly broadside armored vessels with which European nations are making experiments of at least doubtful value.

Whether the majority of the committee approve the whole programme of the policy board, involving the construction of an American Navy, to cost not less than $349,000,000, or whether they dissent from some of its features, does not appear. One point, however, the advocates of this comprehensive plan must frankly admit, that if this nation is to build and maintain the battle ships which it includes, the rest of the plan must be substantially adopted in order to make the fleet contain all the classes of ships necessary for a vast and well-proportioned navy.

Secondly, it seems equally clear to the undersigned that if the whole plan is to be adopted, and yet construction is to proceed by degrees and not by at once authorizing the whole expenditure, then the very last ships to be built should be heavy, armored line-of-battle ships, costing $5,640,000 each; whereas the majority of the committee propose to build these first, and to appropriate comparatively little money for the construction of the harbor-defense monitors, rams, cruisers, gunboats, and torpedo boats recommended by the policy board as a necessary part of their scheme for a complete and adequate navy.

It is the opinion of the undersigned that in the progress of the reconstruction of the American Navy by suitable steps and reasonable and moderate appropriations, which has been auspiciously and successfully begun, the new constructions next to be authorized should be a certain number of proper harbor or coast defense vessels and a considerable number of moderate-sized cruisers and gunboats, varying from vessels of 1,500 and 1,700 tons, like the Dolphin and Yorktown, up to ships like the Boston and Atlanta, of 3,000 tons.

Our unprotected harbors will thus be made partially secure, our naval officers will be able to spend more of their time upon the water instead of being housed on shore duty; they will become familiarized with our own coast, and will perhaps become sufficiently proficient in practical seamanship to be able, whenever the time comes, if the future brings such a period, to take charge of large armored battle ships and go out upon the ocean to meet and destroy, if they can, the fleets of European powers.

But to assume that we have now reached a point when we should substantially discontinue other naval constructions and begin the work of building 38 armored battle ships to cost $177,490,000, or even that we should build forthwith eight of such ships, to cost $45,120,000, is a grave mistake, which, if persisted in, may become a fatal barrier to real, wise, and judicious progress in the rehabilitation of the Navy. We do not now need heavily armored broadside battle ships. We probably never shall need them.

IV.—$46,000,000 NOW FOR BATTLE SHIPS WILL TAKE MONEY AWAY FROM FORTIFICATIONS AND HARBOR DEFENSE.

The expenditure, under the head of the Increase of the Navy, of $46,000,000 for eight armored battle ships, to be authorized by the present Congress, is out of proportion to any sum likely to be authorized for certain kindred objects which should be considered in connection with the naval appropriations. If the line-of-battle ships will be in no proper sense coast-defense vessels, how much is to be appropriated for such defense vessels, and how much for fortifications and guns for the same? These are the first and most vital questions.

Simultaneously with the preparations made in pursuance of the act of August 5, 1882, for the reconstruction of the Navy, the subject of coast and harbor defense was seriously considered, and later, in accordance with the act of Congress of March 3, 1885, the Fortifications Board was appointed, consisting of the Secretary of War (Mr. Endicott), four army officers, two naval officers, and two civilians.

The elaborate report of this Board is dated January 16, 1886 (House Executive Document No. 40, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), and it recommends as a comprehensive plan for defending our entire seacoast and lake frontier: For land defenses for 27 ports, for masonry and earthworks, $31,863,000; for armor for land batteries, $20,300,000; for structural metal, $3,320,000; for guns and mortars, $28,554,000; for carriages, $9,411,800; for floating batteries and their armament: For San Francisco, $10,725,000; for New Orleans, $8,150,000; for submarine mines and their adjuncts, $4,394,000; and for torpedo boats, $9,720,000; or $126,377,800 in all; and the Board recommends appropriations for the first year of $21,000,000, and $9,000,000 annually thereafter, until at the end of fourteen years the scheme would be completed.

This report was submitted to Congress January 23, 1886. Four years have passed, and of the appropriations asked for not more than $5,000,000 have been made; and of the $10,725,000 for the harbor of San Francisco and the $8,150,000 for New Orleans, with which to construct floating batteries, nothing has been given by Congress. The omission has not happened by reason of any lack of confidence in the eminent and able members of the Fortifications Board, or in the soundness of their recommendations; but because Congress has not considered the country as in a condition of emergency requiring undue haste, but has believed that by moderate and reasonable appropriations the work of establishing a suitable coast and harbor defense by fortifications and floating batteries, and of rehabilitating the Navy, could be carried forward without extravagance or waste.

The question now raised is whether a present direction to spend $46,000,000 for eight naval battle ships is contrary to or in accordance with the general policy of Congress concerning fortifications, coast defenses, and naval constructions.

If the national interests require us to contemplate and to at once enter upon the expenditure of $300,000,000 under the War Department for fortifications and coast defenses, in pursuance and in enlargement of the plans of the Fortifications Board, and under the Navy Department of $281,550,000 for naval vessels, as recommended by the policy board, supplemented by at least $50,000,000 for the rehabilitation of the League Island and other navy yards, then we may possibly justify continuing naval construction by building eight large armored line-of-battle ships, costing $46,000,000, that can not go in or out of our shallow harbors.

Such a navy as seems to be thus contemplated by the majority of the committee would make the United States the equal or the superior of any of the European naval powers. It would require the enlargement of our force of seamen from 7,500 to 25,000 or 30,000, and annual expenditures for new constructions, for repairs of the fleet, and for the maintenance of the Navy far beyond any sums hitherto advocated. Are we prepared to thus place and maintain our naval force upon such a footing that we may at any moment be ready to engage on our coast and out upon the open ocean and in European waters with the most formidable naval powers of the Eastern Hemisphere? If we are, here is indeed a new departure, and one that should be entered upon deliberately and with our eyes open to all the present and future burdens which it will entail.

The undersigned is not in favor of such a naval policy. Coast defense should be first amply provided for. All the arts of naval warfare should be kept alive among our people. Industries necessary to the construction of any kind of war vessels or guns should be domesticated. We should restore the flag of our merchant ships and revive the carrying trade in American vessels in all the waters and in all the commercial ports of the globe, and protect our mercantile marine when thus reestablished. We should construct and maintain a navy superior to that of any nation of the Western Hemisphere and to that of the nation owning the Island of Cuba; and there we can stop, it is to be hoped, for many years.

But to build a navy embracing as its principal feature the enormous armored battle ships of European countries, and to make ready to fight at any moment naval engagements on the high seas with those powers, has not hitherto been considered the true American policy. To maintain such a navy, and also a system of fortifications and coast defense, with a land army commensurate with such a naval force, would go far toward bringing the United States into the lamentable condition of the nations of central Europe. They are burdened with great navies and enormous standing armies which are draining the lifeblood of the people and imposing burdens of debt and taxation so grievous that before many years relief from them, if not afforded in any other way, will be accomplished by revolutions.

It may be gratifying to our national pride to talk of building a fleet of enormous armored battle ships with which, disdaining fortifications and coast defense, we may in case of war go out to seek and destroy our enemies upon the ocean, or to carry the war into their country. But when the proposition takes the concrete form of an authorization at this time of eight such ships, to cost $5,640,000 each, or $45,120,000 for the eight, as the inception of a scheme to build 38 line-of-battle ships, to cost $177,400,000, as a part of a navy to cost $249,515,000, it would seem to be wise for Congress at once to consider with great seriousness what shall be the definite national policy concerning the Navy and fortifications and coast defense, and to settle that policy upon a more reasonable and conservative basis.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] who has just taken his seat, it struck me as an anomaly and a thing hard to realize that one bearing the historic name of Washington should utter such sentiments on the floor of this House, when in the final address of the Father of his Country he laid it down as the best advice he could give to those who were to follow him in guiding the destinies of this Republic of ours that "in time of peace we should prepare for war." [Applause.]

The gentleman in his peroration said that when the necessity arose the ships would be ready, and that brave sailors to man them and strong intellects to command them would appear for the emergency; but he omitted to remember that earlier in his remarks he had told us that it takes two years and a half to construct a battle ship. [Laughter.] It is that fact, sir, which makes it necessary for us to commence the construction of these ships in time. For two years no appropriation has been made in this regard for the Navy Department, and therein lies the necessity why the construction of these ships should be provided for without further delay.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish more particularly to direct my remarks in answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], who, representing one of the political parties in this country—all that is left of it—stated on this floor the other day that there was no necessity for the United States to have a navy at all. That gentleman took exception once when I made the remark that he and his party represented only a certain class of people in this country. I would like to call his attention now to the fact that, to the full extent, he does not in his remarks on this subject even represent that class. When he ships his grain from Kansas he does not know where it is going, where it will find a market, or where it will be finally landed; and I call his attention to the fact that for weeks two American vessels lay in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro unable to discharge their cargoes of flour or to free themselves from the unlawful force that was deterring them from the pursuit of their business until that gallant sailor, Admiral Benham, with the same Navy which the gentleman says is useless and ought not to exist, came into the harbor of Rio de Janeiro and escorted these two Baltimore clippers up to the dock and protected them in the discharge of their cargoes.

Therefore, sir, I claim that even from the gentleman's own point of view, even from the standpoint of those who live in the interior and who tell us that there is no need for a navy or for protection on the sea, it is obvious that the Navy, even in time of peace, can be most useful to our commerce in enabling our citizens to pursue their lawful business in foreign countries. The gentleman told us that England needed a navy because she had a commerce. I want to reply to the gentleman that therein lies an error on his

The gentleman also said that even if we must have a navy he objected to the class of ships known as battle ships. He went on to describe them, and he said that they were top-heavy, that we had reached a point beyond which we could not go in constructing armored cruisers, that these battle ships could not enter the harbors where they would be required to go, and that they were useless as a means of defense. He went further and cited the recent naval encounters in the Yalu River and at Wei Hai Wei as illustrations of the uselessness of such ships. I do not know where the gentleman got his information, but I wish to tell him that the battle ships in the Yalu conflict came out, so far as their hulls were concerned, their floating capacity, comparatively unscathed. The light guns of the cruisers made no impression upon them except upon their decks; and I have it from the most reliable authorities in our own Navy that, with a sufficient supply of ammunition and competent sailors and officers, those ships would have been ready for a second engagement inside of forty-eight hours.

The gentleman also said that our country was not able to make armor plate to put upon these ships, and he referred to certain recent scandals that permeated this country in regard to the manufacture of such armor. I again reply to the gentleman that by direction of this House that matter was investigated, and the committee advised the Department to go on with the same contracts, thereby showing that those scandalous rumors were unfounded, and that the firm engaged in furnishing the armor had done it to the best of their ability and up to the requirements of the contracts.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the battle ships now under construction are nearing completion, and while I would not advocate that the Government of the United States should be called upon to furnish work for our skilled workmen or our shipyards, I do state as a sound economic doctrine that if those shipyards are allowed to fall into disuse, and if those skilled workmen are allowed to scatter so as not to be within reach when they are needed, not only shall we not be able to construct battle ships in an hour or a day, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, but we shall not be able to construct them at all.

Do you wish to drive our country back to the position of the South American Republics, who buy their ships from England, France, or other foreign countries, and then when the time of danger comes and those ships are injured, as we have seen was the case in Brazil and Chile in our recent experience, they can not even repair them in their own harbors to fit them to go again into active service?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas further says that these enormous ships would not be able to enter most of the harbors on the Atlantic coast. In reply to that I say it is not intended that these battle ships should enter such harbors. The harbors where they are constructed, the harbors where navy yards exist to repair them, are sufficiently deep for them to enter. The position of a battle ship during times of peace is to be laid up, not to be in service, because of the heavy expense. The position of the battle ship in time of war is where it can conduct what in naval circles is known as offensive-defensive protection. Its position is along our coast, where it may be able to repel any attack which may be made upon us by foreign navies. Just as the cruisers go to far distant ports, and just as the monitors and turrets and other harbor-defense ships are kept within the harbors, the position of the battle ship is a certain distance at sea, to repel invasions, to protect our ports, and prevent any foreign fleet from approaching within such a distance as to be able to do us damage. Therefore the gentleman's objection is not sound.

Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to represent my country in Brazil during the recent revolution. No one could tell what might happen within forty-eight hours. American citizens there appealed for protection to their Government. And to the shame of our country be it said, that although there were American citizens residing there who did not know at what minute their property or lives might be imperiled, there was nothing then in South American waters to be sent to their protection but the Tallapoosa, which lay in the River Plate—an old side-wheel steamer which had been condemned to such an extent that she was not allowed to go to sea—and that gallant ship to which historic associations attach, the Richmond. But when the Richmond entered the harbor of Rio she was like the ideas of the gentleman from Kansas—she was out of date; she was antiquated; she belonged to a past period. One broadside from the Tiradentes or the Richeval, of the Brazilian navy, would have sent that gallant old ship to the bottom, not because of lack of courage on the part of her crew, but because of the inefficiency of the vessel. People appealed to us in South America, asking, "Why is it that we never see the American flag enter the harbor here, notwithstanding the proclaimed sympathy of the United States with the South American Republics and their professed readiness to lend a helping hand to those Governments?"

There is another reason why our country should have an adequate navy. One of our great Democratic statesmen laid down the doctrine which has ever since borne his name—the Monroe doctrine. It has now become not merely a political principle, but a cardinal doctrine of the American people that we will brook no foreign interference either in the political affairs or the commercial relations of this hemisphere. Those who have not followed the course of public events know little what the shot from the gallant Newark across the bow of the Tiradentes meant. I will tell you. It enunciated that the rebellion which was being fostered for the sole purpose of restoring the monarchy in Brazil must come to an end. It was a notice from the United States that we would have no more foreign interference in the political affairs of this continent. When that shot was fired it was understood that the United States stood ready to maintain that doctrine; and thereupon the rebellion collapsed, the new Republic of Brazil was maintained, and the honor of the United States on this continent upheld.

Sir, if we wish to maintain our position among the navies of the world, if we wish our country to occupy a place among the first-class powers, we must be ready to enforce our great national doctrines and to protect our citizens wherever they may wander.

My free-trade friends claim that the success of their doctrines will extend our commerce into other countries. I claim that in such an event there would be so much the more reason why our people should be properly protected by an adequate naval force. If we are going to enter into the great subjects which are coming up before this Congress, if we wish to protect our interests in the Mosquito country, if we wish to protect our interests in Honolulu, if we wish our citizens to be protected in China during the disturbances there, we must increase the size of our Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is perhaps proper that the great commercial metropolis of this country should be heard from on this great question of the maintenance of our Navy. I shall endeavor in the few moments allotted to me to state a few reasons why I think this appropriation should receive at least every Democratic vote in this House.

In the first place, let me indicate that the vital question which arises to-day is whether the Democratic party is to abandon the principle which was first enunciated and advocated by William C. Whitney in 1885 and followed by him in his report of December 1, 1886. Bear in mind in what condition he found our Navy—utterly disorganized, with old wooden vessels, with no factories of armor in this country, and no establishment where high-power guns could be constructed. The first thing to which Mr. Whitney addressed himself was the reorganization of the whole Navy—first, the reorganization of the personnel or military branch; second, the question of supplies; third, the construction of a new Navy. His advice has been followed by our party ever since and was also followed by the able Secretary of the Navy under the Republican Administration, Benjamin F. Tracy. But I regret to say that in the last three or four years we have made inadequate appropriations for the continuance of that policy so ably advocated by Secretary Whitney.

Mr. Chairman, what is the condition of our Navy to-day? We have four great battle ships in process of construction, the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Oregon, all of them of 10,238 tons displacement, and one larger vessel, the Iowa, incorrectly termed by some an armored cruiser, but in reality a battle ship of about 1,000 tons greater displacement. These vessels have been in process of construction for three or four years past, and it is essential that they shall be completed as soon as possible. But we must not rest there. We must make provision, as contemplated in this bill, for the continuance of the work and the construction of at least three new battle ships larger than those now in process of construction.

In naval matters it is an axiom that there is no such thing as standing still. We must either progress or retrograde. And unless we vote the appropriation contemplated here we shall find ourselves sinking as a naval power to the seventh or eighth grade.

I advance the postulate that so far as the command of the sea is concerned, and so far as naval warfare in the future is concerned, success or control on the sea depends not on the torpedo nor the ram, but on the battle ship. And I find that all of the greatest naval authorities bear me out in the view that the torpedo is secondary in importance to the battle ship. We can provide for the destruction of the torpedoes by what is known as the torpedo destroyer. But all the nations of Europe, Asia, and the whole world must depend either for supremacy at sea or for the protection of their harbors and their commerce on the battle ship. So I submit that it will not answer to provide an appropriation for torpedo boats; it will not answer to provide an appropriation for cruisers, either armored or unarmored, but we must provide the means for the construction of three great battle ships.

See what England has done and is doing; and we can not rival her or approach her in the celerity of construction of war ships. You must bear in mind that the vessel just launched by the British admiralty was finished in five days less than one year; that is to say, that that period of time elapsed between the laying of the keel and the launching of the vessel, and the vessel herself will be finished and ready for sea in August next to make her speed or steam trial.

So England needs but eighteen months for the completion of one of these immense battle ships of 14,900 tons displacement, and the Magnificent and the Majestic form but the first two of a class of nine vessels of this displacement in process of construction; and this class of vessels with a speed, at forced draft, of 17½ knots, and a natural or not forced draft of 16 knots, only follows a series of eight magnificent battle ships recently completed of only 730 tons less displacement. So we have England and all the countries of Europe, and China and Japan, Chile and Brazil building battle ships all the time, and it is essential for our protection and the maintenance of our position among the nations of the world that we should continue to do so.

Now, bear in mind what Secretary Whitney said in 1886, that distinguished Secretary of the Navy, worthy to receive any office, in my opinion, that is within the gift of the American people, that great Secretary of the Navy said that whatever our commercial policy might be we certainly, irrespective of party, should agree in the view that we should be enabled to manufacture all of the implements of war within our own borders. We have now built up since the inauguration of that policy in 1886 great industrial establishments and are prepared to manufacture our own armor, armor plate, and harveyized plates and gun forgings for the heaviest caliber guns ourselves, without appealing to any foreign country for aid. Unless this appropriation be made, all of these industries will fall fallow, and at least 100,000 employees will be affected, and perhaps go entirely out of employment. So, I submit that it is important we should make this appropriation. We should make it not only for the protection of our coast or seaboard, but for the purpose of preserving a great national industry and preventing the 100,000 workmen from being thrown out of employment.

A word or two about the question of the defense of our seacoast or seaboard. We must not depend upon the torpedo boats along our shores for that purpose; we must not depend upon torpedo boats within the harbors; but the best system of protective defense is that of offensive defense. We must have ten or twelve great battle ships on the Atlantic, at least two on the Pacific, and we must have a fleet of eight or ten battle ships ready to sweep down on the enemy when his fleet comes to seal up the harbor of New York at Sandy Hook or any other of our seaboard cities. The authorities bear me out in the proposition that in order to protect our seaboard properly and adequately we must have a large fleet of battle ships.

I believe in an American policy for Americans, and I believe not only in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal and its defense against foreign control, according to the platform of my party, but I believe, also, in the wisdom of a great repairing and coaling station in the Sandwich Islands, and the establishment of a dry dock there.

Now, if we want to enforce adequately our great American doctrine, the Monroe doctrine, if we want a vigorous foreign policy, it is essential that we should have a large and sufficient number of battle ships, and that we should always have one or two of those battle ships in process of construction.

In conclusion, gentlemen of the committee—for it is impossible within a time so limited for me to adduce all the arguments in favor of this appropriation—I say to you, gentlemen of the Democratic party, whatever our differences may have been about other questions, you should at least stand by your party in the maintenance of a proper navy. Do not abandon that part of our platform which states that we favor the maintenance of a navy strong enough for all purposes of national defense.

I listened with a great deal of interest yesterday to the eloquent and impassioned argument made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT], an argument in favor of an impossible millennium, in favor of a general era of peace, and in the course of that argument my attention was called to that beautiful poem of Longfellow's, which was quoted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and which was inspired during the bridal tour of Mr. Longfellow, when he visited the arsenal at Springfield, and when naturally his every thought turned to joy and peace. But the gentleman from Massachusetts failed to quote one of the stanzas following. He quoted the beautiful stanza:

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestow'd on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts.

But he failed to quote a subsequent stanza, in which the poet says:

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say "peace."

You will observe that the poet holds out no such view as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the millennium will have come in the year 1895.

He says:

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease.

Gentlemen, nineteen hundred years have passed since the advent of the Man of Nazareth, and instead of growing nearer and more near to a universal era of peace, all the energies, all the inventive talent, all the genius of the human mind are now devoted to the manufacture and construction and suggestion of implements of war more horrible, more fatal in the power of execution than any which the world has heretofore seen. So I submit that, laudable as these views of the learned gentleman from Massachusetts may be, appealing as they must appeal to us as men of human sympathies, they are impracticable, they are beyond the pale of thought except as a philosophical view. And it is only our duty in the way of self-preservation to take care of our own. You know what peaceful arbitration amounts to. You have seen that in the result of the Bering Sea arbitration, and I submit that this country should be powerful enough to have the latent force of arms, and a strong armament, so that it can enforce its demands whenever we find that peaceful arbitration is out of the question.

And I say to you, gentlemen, in conclusion, that I hope you, one and all, Democrats and Republicans alike, will vote without a moment's hesitation in favor of this appropriation. Vote for it because it involves a question of the honor and dignity of this country as a nation. Vote for it because it involves the continuance and prosperity of certain great American industries which have been believed in and advocated by the leaders of both the Democratic and Republican parties.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not purpose to discuss at length the merits of this question. I wish to say a word, however, in favor of the battle ships. We are weak only upon the ocean. No nation upon the globe would think of attacking us on the land, or if they should do so, the result would be such as to discover to them that they had made a serious mistake.

I was interested yesterday while listening to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON]—and I have listened to the same kind of arguments from others—urging that we are so great, so strong, and so imposing that no one would dare attack us upon the ocean even though we had no navy at all.

This is a foolish assumption, unwarranted by all that may be learned from the lessons taught in the history of nations and the character of mankind.

Why, Mr. Chairman, when the lion's claws are clipped and his teeth are drawn the fox may dare attack him. However great, strong, and imposing we may be, we could not risk an issue even with Japan if she have a navy and we have none; our great strength would be useless without the means to make it available. By failing to provide ourselves with such ships of war as our country, with its immense and diversified interests demands, we invite attacks that would never be made were we prepared to meet them.

Strong in our geographical position, in the energy and bravery of our people, it is hardly less than a disgrace that we should be nearly defenseless upon the sea. Why, England will build this year more tonnage of armored ships, carrying more and larger guns, than all we have in our Navy, and this, too, with our extended coast line upon two oceans, which is now almost entirely unprotected against attack.

An efficient Navy is necessary to our independence and respectable standing among the nations of the earth. It has been so always, and there is nothing more gallant in the history of nations than the part which the American Navy has acted in the past. No American heart inspired by patriotic feeling can fail to swell with pride while recounting the exploits of our countrymen upon the ocean in the wars of the Revolution and of 1812.

We were the first to meet and vanquish Englishmen upon the sea. Inferior as were our vessels in numbers and size, our countrymen made a record so honorable in its character and so conclusive of the superiority of our sailors in skill and gallantry, that it is to-day a source of patriotic inspiration to every true American soul. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Give us an adequate Navy and if occasion shall require it the illustrious deeds of our countrymen upon the sea will be repeated. Our sailors are the best on the globe, our gunners can not be excelled. No people ever have produced, and I believe no people ever can produce, officers who can handle ships in action with the skill of Americans.

Let the battle ships be built. I would not have such an enormous navy as England has. We do not need it. We have not patches of territory all around the globe to defend as she has. But our own protection, our honor, and our dignity demand that we should have a Navy sufficient to defend our coast and guard our interests wherever they may be menaced. [Applause.]

But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] has run this debate into an argument for free ships. Possibly he was anticipating the consideration of the free-ship bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZGERALD].

This would seem to settle the question which has hitherto existed in our minds, whether there is any industry of our people which the Bourbon leaders of the Democratic party have not determined to destroy. Having already blasted our land with its legislation in favor of foreign nations it now seeks to go down to the shores of the sea and make havoc and desolation there.

The Scriptures say there are three things which are insatiable, the sea, the grave, and a barren woman. Had the Bible remained to be written in these times the inspired writer would have added a fourth, more insatiable than all the others, the destructive mania of modern Democracy, when it rests its eyes upon any profitable avocation of our countrymen in which they may achieve for themselves the comforts of life, contribute to the general welfare, and advance the dignity, the honor, and the greatness of their country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Whatever is calculated to develop the rich resources of our land, employ and justly remunerate its labor, add to our common store of wealth, hasten our progress in all that is most desirable to a brave, energetic, aspiring people, and respond to the national yearning for a higher plane of living and a strong, independent position among the nations of the earth, appears to be regarded by the majority party in this Congress as a red rag is looked upon by a mad bull, and no less likely to receive a furious attack from it.

It is not enough, as it seems, gentlemen, to satisfy your greed for destruction that you have crippled or destroyed every industry of our people which you could reach through your miserable tariff bill, but you now propose to swoop down like vultures upon our shipyards and say to our shipwrights that they must construct no more American ships unless they do it at the rate of wages which is paid upon the Clyde.

You do more than this. You determine to introduce the foreigner to participate and eventually monopolize our extensive and profitable coastwise carrying trade.

Almost at the beginning of our Government the statesmen of that period foresaw the great value and advantage to our country of protecting this trade. They proceeded to do it. It has been one of the most important factors in the promotion of our prosperity and power.

To-day we have the finest line of coasting vessels afloat, unsurpassed in their sailing qualities, unequaled in their beauty of construction, manned by crews as hardy and brave as sail the seas, furnishing whenever necessary a nursery for our Navy, an arm of strength as well as a source of wealth to our country.

Should the gentleman's free-ship project be enacted into law it will be but the first step toward breaking down the barriers of protection erected by our forefathers to this pursuit so valuable to our people and giving it to foreigners, who will monopolize it, because they will follow it with cheaper vessels than our own, manned by sailors more poorly paid and fed and with much fewer comforts of living.

But all this is in line with Democratic policy. It is modern Democratic statesmanship. It is destructive of whatever it touches in our own land or that belongs to our own people anywhere. The same policy of stupidity or infidelity to American interests which is sending 45,000,000 of American sheep to the shambles in the interest of foreign woolgrowers, crippling our lumber and salt industries, closing our mines and embarrassing our manufactures, impoverishing our merchants and farmers, and sentencing our workmen to idleness and poverty would decree an abandonment of our shipyards for the benefit of British builders and a surrender of our splendid and profitable coastwise carrying trade to Canadian and English coasters. The gentleman's free-ship policy would accomplish this.

The American shipbuilder, who is constructing the finest vessels, whether of iron or wood, that sail the ocean, and who sends the evidences of American skill and enterprise to every quarter of the globe where the seas and rivers exist, and the American coaster seem to be about the only men in our country whom your destructive tariff law could not reach, and now you would place your paralyzing hand on them.

If you shall succeed in effecting your purpose then you can celcelebrate your victory upon the ruins of a grander prosperity, built up by your countrymen during many years of protection, than has ever brought comfort to the hearts and homes of any other people known in the history of the human race, and when the people get at you again they will smite you with a more terrific thunderbolt than crushed you on the 6th of last November.

But the Bourbon element of the Democracy, which controls now, as it always has the Democratic party, is nothing if not destructive. Condemned to thirty-two years retirement from national control for its attempt to dissolve the Union, it now returns to power to compass so far as it can the ruin of a most marvelous prosperity which grew up during the generation of its impotency for serious harm.

It constructs nothing. Its unsuccessful attempt to reestablish a corrupt and semisavage monarchy in Hawaii is the only monument of its endeavor to build up anything that has occurred within the memory of men now living. Its mission seems to be to tear down what patriotic hands have erected. An invading enemy could be hardly more determined in its efforts to annihilate all the sources of our thrift and greatness as a nation than the Democratic party seems to be in all it has done and proposes to do.

This attack upon our shipyards is made upon an industry which was guarded and cherished with particular solicitude by our forefathers, which has been the pride of our people, and is peculiarly national in character and far-reaching benefits. Perhaps no more correct reason can be given why it is offensive to modern Bourbon Democracy and is now the object of its assault than the fact that it is associated with the most inspiring achievements which illustrate the pages of American history.

In shipbuilding as well as in the character of our intrepid sailors we have led the world. No finer specimens of the shipwright's art ever traversed the ocean than have been modeled and built in American shipyards.

We built the Great Republic and many others of her class, whose sailing qualities were unrivaled in their time, and whose symmetry and beauty of model were the admiration of all who loved to look upon splendid specimens of naval construction. They furnished the models for the great iron steamers which now cross the ocean with such remarkable speed as to make Europe our near neighbor.

The gentleman's policy would do nothing less than to destroy the shipyards of America, where these grand results have been achieved, and where to-day the finest ships in the world are being constructed, disperse our shipwrights, deprive our country and the world of the fruits of American genius in this grand pursuit, and make American shipbuilding a thing of the past.

The great iron shipyards of the Cramps, from which has recently been launched the magnificent steamer St. Louis, unsurpassed if not unequalled by any ship of the kind on the globe, the splendidly equipped establishments at Newport News, Chester, Bath, and San Francisco which have produced so many steel vessels that have carried to the four corners of the globe proofs of the constructive genius and power of our people, are all doomed to abandonment and destruction by such a law as the gentleman would enact. This means the discharging from employment of more than 20,000 workmen and the deprivation and distress of 100,000 people.

There are no sturdier, steadier, sober, and more intelligent workmen in our country than our shipwrights; none who contribute more to the wealth and greatness of the American nation, and at the same time give it as little trouble.

Where will they go? What will they do when you have driven them from their present avocation? Your policy of ruin has closed every other avenue of industry to them. There is not an honorable pursuit in the land that does not find labor begging at its doors for employment.

Had you destroyed this great industry two years ago, when the country was safely under the protective policy of the Republican party, when the factories were all running, the furnaces blazing, the mines open and worked, the farmers finding good markets, and labor everywhere in demand, it would have been nothing less than a great national crime, but now it will be both a crime and a cruelty.

I am not sorry that the gentleman went to the length which he did and developed the animus of that side of the House upon this subject. We know now who is the friend and who the enemy of American shipbuilding; who would have us employ the skill and genius of our own people to construct a Navy and merchant marine, and who would give this industry to the foreigner; who has a pride in the splendid results of American genius, and whose admiration is all reserved for those who live beyond the ocean and carry another flag than our own.

But I said that the vocation of shipbuilding was of national importance. Every vocation of our people is indirectly of national importance, since no part of our people can prosper or suffer without affecting for weal or woe every other part of them.

But shipbuilding is of national importance directly and in the largest sense, and for this reason our forefathers made special laws for its protection.

They enacted that no vessel should be entitled to an American register and carry the American flag except it should be built within the jurisdiction of our Government.

They also made laws protecting our coasting trade. What was the purpose of these laws, which are almost as old as the Government? The motive of our ancestors is plain. They, in their wisdom, foresaw the great advantage to our people of constructing our own ships and controlling our own domestic commerce.

They knew and regarded the fact that no nation from the palmy days of Athens's commerce to their times had ever possessed and retained a great commercial marine except it built its own ships. They knew the value of our shipyards to our people as a source of employment. They felt the necessity of developing the skill of our people in constructing ships as the foundation of a navy and to make us independent of the world in this calling.

But the gentleman from Kansas and most of the party on his side of the House do not seem to feel it. He says we can not build ships because we pay our shipwrights high wages. But we can and we do it, and we intend, if possible, not to reduce the rate of wages. The gentleman has talked a good deal about the wrongs of the workman. But now he proposes to reduce the wages of the men who work in our shipyards to the low wages paid on the Clyde, or transfer their avocation to foreign countries.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another consideration in connection with this debate which seems to me to be the most serious of all.

The opposition which we find here to building these battle ships and providing something like adequate protection for our nation's interests, betrays a lack of patriotic spirit on the part of a certain class of men in this House and in the country which is to be deplored. That unpatriotic spirit seems to be popular just now.

Why, we found it in the case of Hawaii, when a President of the United States had signed a treaty and sent it to the Senate, a treaty that would have annexed these beautiful Islands to this country and given us a position that commands the Pacific coast, a position, too, that could be made as impregnable as Gibraltar, and it was rejected, and every effort made to turn back the tide of civilization and restore a rotten monarchy. It was opposed in every way, and with a bitterness that can hardly be accounted for. Oh, I would rather have the future reputation of honest, intelligent, patriotic John L. Stevens, saying in his dying moments, "Stevens pulled up the flag and he never pulled it down," than all that will remain of Presidents and Congresses that struggled to detach Hawaii from our influence and interests, and return it to a government of barbarism. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

In Samoa, too, somebody wanted to give away all that we had there. In Japan, also, this Government, through certain gentlemen, wanted to interfere against the Mikado and in favor of China, which meant to favor the British interests there. And when, Mr. Chairman, we came to make a tariff, there was a certain class in this House and in the country that desired to give away everything we had; to give away American interests to whomsoever would take them. I say that is the saddest and most serious part of the case; and part of the Democratic party, at least, with the Administration, has done a harm that I fear may seriously trouble us in the future in endeavoring, perhaps unconsciously, to blunt the patriotic spirit of the people of this country. He who does that does us the greatest possible harm, for in the patriotic hearts of the people rests our security. Without them our institutions can not exist. When Demosthenes was eloquently urging the people of Athens to struggle against Philip for the protection of Greece, Eschines was leading his party against his own country, not in battle but in the councils of the nation.

When Hannibal was fighting Rome, with his matchless genius endeavoring to crush the great enemy of Carthage, there was a copper-head party at home, led by Hanno, that finally defeated his purpose and brought Carthage to ruin. Oh, let it not come to pass here that gentlemen shall take a position that shall finally build up a party in this country that shall be a party of unpatriotism, a party that shall oppose everything which the interests of the people demand, and which shall endeavor to put a check on the power, the grandeur, and the glory of this great nation.

Battle ships! Why, as I have said, England this year will build more battle ships of larger tonnage, carrying more weight of metal, than the entire battle ships of our Navy. She will this year increase her ships beyond the number and strength of all we have, and we talk about this little niggardly appropriation for a few battle ships which we need to enable us even to do the police duty of the United States upon the ocean. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Have gentlemen no pride in their country? Do they wish to see it shorn of power to defend its interests and its honor? Would they have its ports the prey of every second or third class nation on the globe? Would they see it so defenseless that it must quail at every threat of other nations, and feel its incompetency to guard its dignity and maintain its rights? [Applause.]

If they do the people do not, and as much as gentlemen have done to blunt in the hearts of the men and women of our land their earnest love of country, they will find when the trial day shall come that they have undertaken a task that can not be accomplished. Let us have the battle ships. The patriotism and wisdom of the nation demand it, and we shall not be held guiltless by those whom we represent if we shall not respond, by our votes, to that demand. The people are proud of their country, proud of its grand history, proud of its progress and its prowess, proud of its institutions and their beneficent influence upon mankind, abroad as well as at home, and they will not see its arm of power paralyzed by those who are monarchists at heart, though they present an American surface to the world. [Great applause.]

[Mr. COOMBS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, before beginning my remarks, I desire to state to the committee that the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE, who is a member of the minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs, was to have spoken to-day, but he is not here and his time has been occupied by other gentlemen. I have received a message from him stating that he is not well and unable to be in the House at this time, but that he is in favor of the bill as reported from the committee, and that if he were here would take part in the debate and advocate its passage.

Some time ago there was a question even in my mind as to the propriety of the provisions embraced in this bill for new battle ships, but the Secretary of the Treasury has removed from my mind all doubt as to the propriety of making these appropriations. In a communication to the Senate on the 2d day of this month the Secretary estimated that for this calendar year—and I wish the House distinctly to understand the time that the estimate covers—that for this calendar year, under the existing tariff laws, there will be a surplus over and above all public expenditures of more than $23,000,000. That being the case, the objection based upon the supposed inability of the Government to undertake the construction of these battle ships is removed. Other gentlemen may discredit the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I am not prepared to do that. I for one am not willing to discredit the authorized head of the Treasury Department in this statement.

I am sure no other gentleman will do so. It being, then, apparent that we shall have at our disposal funds sufficient to build a navy, I propose first to discuss the question whether or not it is good policy. I can not go into detail and answer the various statements of all the gentlemen who have addressed this committee. The last gentleman who spoke in opposition to this bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], had the temerity to state to this House that the construction of these vessels—I suppose he meant the maintenance of these and all other vessels—was going to entail upon this country the extraordinary cost of between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000. Why, Mr. Speaker, this appropriation, all told, carries a little more than $31,000,000.

This appropriation embraces in its features enough money to finish every vessel authorized by existing law, and at the end of the fiscal year 1896, with the appropriation carried in this bill, every vessel authorized by law will have been completed except the battle ship Iowa. And under the most adverse circumstances, when the gentlemen on the other side take control of the House and the Senate they can carry on the appropriations contemplated in the construction of these battle ships, they can appropriate every dollar for the construction as it progresses, and the next naval appropriation bill will not exceed, under any circumstances, in my judgment, over $20,000,000 for the support of the Navy.

I stated yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that for the current expenses of the Navy Department we had not departed substantially from the features of the bills for 1894 and 1895. Yet, to my surprise, the gentleman from Tennessee states to this House that we have exceeded the estimates of the Department by over $300,000. That is true. We have appropriated in this bill $844,937 more than the estimates. But we do this because we provide in this bill for carrying out the recommendations of the Department. We do it because the Department recommended that we should add to our naval force at least 2,000 enlisted men.

We have authorized the enlistment of those 2,000 men, but we appropriate only for 1,000, taking it for granted that perhaps during the next fiscal year the Secretary of the Navy can only enlist possibly 1,000, or probably may not have use for the whole number, though it is well that he should have the authority to enlist them. The pay of these 1,000 additional enlisted men will be $349,000 and the cost for their maintenance $109,000. In addition to that we have added to this bill the sum necessary for the first year toward planning the construction and beginning these new vessels which are authorized.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], who has addressed the committee, has had the boldness to state that these vessels were eventually to cost $23,000,000. I should like to know what authority he has for making any such statement. Vessel after vessel has been authorized by law; yet in no instance, so far as I know, has the cost for the construction of any vessel gone beyond the amount authorized by law; and in more cases than one the vessel was constructed, completed, and armed for less money than the law authorized. Therefore I can not see why the gentleman should state in good faith, when we appropriate not exceeding $12,000,000, that the expense is going to be $23,000,000. There is no reason in law and none in precedent for such a statement.

The gentleman from Kansas also stated to the House that there are only five or six ports in the United States which these first-class battle ships can enter. If he knows no more about the Navy generally than he knows about this particular subject, his statements are not entitled to consideration at the hands of this House. I read from an article called "The ships of the new Navy:"

Battle ships will draw more water undoubtedly, but they certainly will not exceed 25 feet.

It is a common mistake to suppose that we have no harbors which vessels drawing 30 feet can enter. We have 38 ports which vessels drawing 30 feet can enter at half tide, including Eastport, Rockland, and Portland, Me.; Portsmouth, N. H.; Marblehead and New Bedford, Mass.; Newport, R. I.; New London, Conn.; Gardiners Bay and several other points on Long Island; New York; Hampton Roads, Va.; Key West, Fla.; Santa Barbara, Monterey, San Francisco, and Mendocino City, Cal.; Olympia, Port Townsend, Tacoma, and Seattle, Wash. The ports of Boston, Mass., Lewes, Del., and New Orleans, La., can be entered by vessels drawing 25 feet. The port of New York has a depth of 30 feet of water throughout the whole channel at mean low water, so that a ship drawing 30 feet may enter at any stage of the tide.

It thus appears that there are 38 ports of our country which a vessel drawing 30 feet of water can enter.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the gentleman from Kansas is a fresh-water sailor.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Yes, sir; quite "fresh."

Now, we are told that there is no necessity for a navy; that all the vessels which have been constructed under authority of law are useless and worthless. Sir, there never was a more barefaced proposition made in the halls of Congress. I assert that every vessel authorized and constructed by authority of Congress answers the purpose for which it was built. If we have been building unarmored and armored cruisers which are worthless, why is it that the other nations of the earth have not found it out and discarded them?

Why is it that every unarmored cruiser and every armored cruiser owned by France, by England, by Germany, and by all the first-class powers of the earth is carried on the register of the respective nations to-day—officered, manned, provisioned, and supplied with sufficient ammunition to engage in battle?

Mr. Chairman, an officer in command of an unarmored cruiser would be exceedingly foolish, and would be court-martialed, if he should engage a battle ship at odds when he could get away and save his vessel. But what was the policy of the commanders of English and American vessels as far back as the war of 1812? They sought each other out. A vessel of 20 guns in the English navy would seek out one of 20 guns in the American Navy; a challenge would pass, and they would engage in conflict. So it would be now in case of a war. The unarmored cruiser would search out the unarmored cruiser of the enemy; the protected cruiser would search out the protected cruiser, and when the fight by fleet of ships was on the battle ships, provided for under this law, would take their places in the line of battle, and the protected and unprotected cruisers would take their proper places in the line. Each would do its part, and the sum total would be the science and the bravery of either side, and perhaps the preponderance of guns would weigh the most in the battle.

But we are told that we do not need any navy at all, and that Great Britain is willing to arbitrate. Great Britain never arbitrates with anybody except one who is ready to fight her. Great Britain used the American colonies, before the American Revolution, to wrest from France her French provinces, and what return did we get for it? When we came to seek our independence, forgetting that we had given up all of this valuable territory, she invited the savages to aid in preventing the achievement of the independence for which our fathers fought; and after we had achieved independence she, by act after act, by impressing our seamen, and by other aggressive acts, compelled us, the infant Republic of the world, as we were at that time, to declare war against the greatest power of Europe. We declared war and we fought it, and we licked her from Champlain to New Orleans. [Applause.] Arbitrate with us! If we had not these battle ships and cruisers of ours, and if it was not understood to be the policy of the United States Government that we would go on building up this Navy, she would never request arbitration with us. Her dealings would be very different.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. That is correct.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We would never hear of arbitration then.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] said that there was an era now on earth of "peace and good will" amongst all men. If England wants to arbitrate let her disband her naval forces. If she wants to arbitrate that is the first step. If England is to disarm her naval force and rely upon arbitration in the future, let her discard it. But she is not going to do it. And if we made the demand she would say, of course, "The complications in Europe are such that they will not permit us to do that;" but when a complication arose here, she would find it very easy to spare a few of her battle ships to send across and give us considerable trouble.

Why, my own State was invaded by the British soldiers in 1812, and the United States Government has paid more to our citizens for losses sustained by that invasion, more money, than it would have cost to have maintained a large fleet in Chesapeake Bay.

Without the aid of the British fleet they never could have landed their forces on our shores. Without the aid of the British fleet they could never have landed at New Orleans. I have no faith in the protestations of the English Government. I have never known them to let go a single inch of territory on which they had their clutches. History does not record any such transaction as that where England has got her hands on any part of the world.

A MEMBER. Not even Ireland.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Not even Ireland, or Scotland, or Wales, or India, or any of the islands in the sea.

I want to say this in this connection: When the British army invaded New Orleans they invaded it because the transaction which secured to us the transfer of that vast Louisiana territory from the French Government was so recent that they thought if they could only defeat an American army at New Orleans, at the mouth of the Mississippi River, they could own all the territory covered by the cession of Louisiana by France.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. It was because of the defeat of the French fleet by the British at Trafalgar that that cession was made.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. My attention is called to the fact that it was the defeat of the French and Spanish navy at Trafalgar that induced Napoleon to part with that valuable possession, and transfer it to us. I might go into that question more at length, Mr. Chairman, and discuss the effect of the battle of the Nile, and the battle of Trafalgar, and the battles of Lake Erie and Lake Champlain, but they have been all gone into by other gentlemen who have discussed this question.

Now, I am obliged to the State of Massachusetts for one thing, and that is, to say that there is more than one statesman who has hailed from that great State as a member of the Everett family. A gentleman by the name of Edward Everett, who occupied quite a prominent place in the history of the United States, and whose memory is revered and respected by all of the people of this land, a man of the largest culture, has made some remarks on a kindred question, to which I will refer you. I can not read all of his speech, but it was delivered in 1864. He was the chairman presiding at a complimentary dinner given to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, at the Revere House in Boston, on the 12th day of March, 1864. At that time he used this language:

But, gentlemen, it is not exclusively nor mainly these commercial associations which have led our people to cherish a navy. They have felt that those great natural powers, the world-surrounding ocean, its shores and its depths, its harbors and its boundless pathways, the winds that sweep its surface, the currents which obey their impulse, the living tribes which swarm upon its shoals or wallow in its abysses, were intended by a gracious Providence to rank high among the materials of that greatest creation of the wisdom of man, a civilized commonwealth. They have deduced from all history, ancient and modern, they have inherited with the primal traditions of the mother country, the vital truth, that for territory situated on the seaboard, naval skill and strength are the indispensable condition of national independence, safety, and power; a truth, by the way, enough of itself to show the madness of the South in attempting to sever her connection with a great naval power, with the inevitable effect, if she could succeed in the suicidal attempt, of placing her own coasts, harbors, and the mouths of her rivers at the mercy of every foreign power able to keep a few war steamers at sea.

The patriots of the Revolution, South as well as North, saw this. Mr. Edward Rutledge told his fellow-citizens of South Carolina that "they had no other resource, in time of danger, than the naval force of our Northern friends." It has been so from the dawn of history. It was a navy which enabled a little city of Greece to beat back the barbarous hordes of the East. It was a navy which enabled Carthage so long to dispute the progress of the Romans to universal dominion. It was a navy—nay, it was one naval battle—which gave Augustus the Empire of the world; a navy which carried the Northmen from the polar circle to the coasts of France, to Sicily, and Constantinople; and which made Venice and Genoa, alternately, the mistresses of the Mediterranean and the Levant, and, through them, of the commerce of the East. It was their navies which, in the dawn of the modern political system of Europe, put it in the power of Spain and little Portugal to divide between them, like the two halves of an orange, no small part of the newly discovered world. It was her naval strength which prevented England from being crushed in the Titanic struggle with Spain in the sixteenth century; by which, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, she laid the foundation of her vast colonial empire on this continent, in India, and Australia; and by which, even now, she belts the globe with the sovereign girdle of her dependencies.

That, Mr. Chairman, was the language of a very distinguished gentleman in Massachusetts, the late Edward Everett, father of the gentleman who addressed the House yesterday.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I am partial in this business. I have always been for a navy, and always will be for a great navy.

The gentleman says, "Peace!" Yes, nobody desires peace more than I do. Nobody desires that this country shall remain at peace more than I do. But I go further than that. I go away beyond the desire to have peace. I go to the extent that this country of ours shall put itself in a condition to command peace. [Applause.]

There is but one way to do that, and that is to build your Navy. That is the one popular branch of the military arm of the Government. It is the one branch of the military arm of the Government that is popular in every part of the country. Why, sir, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GEISSENHAINER], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has stated to the House the number of miles comprising our coast. This coast, counting in the Lake States, embraces over 16,000 miles. Why, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] said it is impossible to place a battle ship at every port. Did anybody ever say it was necessary to do it? Certainly not. What I say is this, that we want for our coast defense on the Pacific, the Atlantic, and the Gulf of Mexico sufficient battle ships to meet the enemy at any given point, because, with the facility with which information is now conveyed, it is not a very difficult matter to collect a fleet in from three to six days upon any part of our coast. That is all that is intended.

I desire to say this to the gentleman, that it is much more economical to build your battle ships and have them at your command, so that you can order them up and down the coast, at immensely less cost than you can build forts and put guns in them at every single point which can be attacked on our seacoast. Sir William Pitt had but one motto, Mr. Chairman, so far as statesmanship was concerned, for the English Government. It was a catching phrase. The one word was "Security!" Security for the English people, security for the merchantmen of the English nation, security for its inhabitants at home and abroad; and that covers the case. So far as we are concerned we go beyond that; I go beyond that. I not only desire security, Mr. Chairman, for American citizens at home and abroad; I insist that when a merchantman of Baltimore sends his cargo to Rio that it shall be landed. Our nation did it when we had the best fleet that ever assembled for many a day in the waters of Rio, and the merchant ships of my own town unloaded their cargoes when the Englishmen and Frenchmen did not. But I go beyond that; away beyond that. I claim that it is the province of good American citizenship and statesmanship that the American fleet shall dominate, that the American people shall control the western waters of the Atlantic Ocean and the eastern waters of the Pacific, and any man who is willing to surrender for his country either of these propositions is not worthy to represent his people in this Congress.

My Democratic friends, we are told by gentlemen on the other side, over and over and over again, that the Navy has been built, but never yet has it been built by a majority of this side of the House voting for it; and I am ashamed to say that that charge is almost true. And yet, my associates on this side of the House, you have never gone into a Presidential campaign that you did not tell the people what the Democratic party did for the Navy before the war. You never had a convention that you did not pledge the people that you were going to build this important branch of the military service of the country. I will not take time to read it; but in 1888 you took special pains to tell the country that you approved the administration by Secretary Whitney of the Navy Department, and gave him great credit for building your war vessels. In 1893, in the convention at Chicago, presided over by my friend in front of me [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia], you adopted another resolution, saying to the country that you were in favor of building and maintaining the Navy commensurate with the population, wealth, and dignity of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not that about the only plank of the Democratic platform in Chicago that we have not gone back on?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We have not gone back on that. Sometimes people do not know what they put in platforms.

Mr. SIMPSON. Do you know of any promise made in the platform adopted by the Chicago convention that has been fulfilled?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. So far as I am concerned, we will carry out this one.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to see them carry out one thing?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I desire, Mr. Chairman, just to call attention to something said by the Secretary of the Navy himself some years ago.

The report which was brought into the House on March 10, 1886, by Mr. Herbert, then chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said:

The geographical situation of the United States and the relations we bear to other nations are peculiar. We have no rival on the western continent, and we justly feel secure against any attack an enemy might make upon us by land. But we are without adequate means of defending our foreign or our coastwise commerce, and the cities scattered along our long line of seacoast are absolutely at the mercy of any second-rate naval power of the world.

Your committee have not thought it profitable to inquire into the causes which have resulted in placing the United States in this anomalous position among the nations of the earth. But a brief retrospect may be useful in enabling us to decide what should be our policy for the future.

Prior to the war of 1812 there were some serious differences of opinion among our statesmen as to whether the United States ought to attempt to become an important naval power, but from the moment when the news came of the brilliant victories of Hull and Lawrence at sea and Perry and McDonough on the lakes, the question was decided.

From that day the American Navy was an object of more or less pride and affection under every Administration. We built the best ships afloat and armed them with guns which were at least equal to any in the world. We did not aspire to be, because it was not necessary, but we demonstrated our capacity to become the equal if not the superior of any naval power in the world. This was believed by the statesmen of that era to be the attitude the United States should assume before the world.

Your committee see no reason why we should entirely depart from that policy now. We believe this Government should at least create a navy which will be respectable in size, and that we should demonstrate our capacity to increase it rapidly to any required extent.

In 1846, in pursuit of the policy then agreed on by all, the United States founded the present Naval Academy. This institution is said to have owed its existence primarily to that eminent citizen, who now lives to witness the fruits of his wisdom, the Hon. George Bancroft.

The Naval Academy keeps abreast with the foremost in this era of development, and it has furnished us with a personnel for our Navy unequalled in training and culture by that of any other nation. The officers thus trained are drawn from all portions of the country, so that the Navy, in so far as officers are concerned, is a representative body.

But these officers would be practically useless in case of war now with any first or second rate naval power, because our ships now in commission are of an obsolete type, and they are armed with guns which are practically useless against the armored vessels of to-day.

In 1860 the era of wooden ships and stone forts was drawing to a close. Some efforts had been made in the direction of armored ships by several nations. A number of armored batteries had been designed, and Napoleon III, in 1858, had protected one of his vessels with about 3 inches of iron. But these were all untried.

The great battle between the Merrimac and the Monitor showed the power and value of iron armor for the protection of battle ships, and the system of warfare at sea was revolutionized. The United States showed wonderful enterprise and ingenuity in building ironclad vessels during the four years of our civil strife; but since that war ceased, now twenty-one years ago, we have made no advance.

Our Navy now is not equal to what it was in 1860. But all other maritime nations, profiting by the lessons taught during our civil war, have vied with each other in improving their navies. Iron took the place of wood for vessels, and steel has now taken the place of iron for both vessels and guns. Ships of war have grown larger and heavier, guns have grown larger and heavier, and for twenty years the contest has gone on between the power of armor to resist and the power of guns to pierce. It now seems to be almost definitely settled that a modern projectile, thrown from the heaviest and best gun, will pierce at point-blank range the heaviest armor a seagoing vessel can carry. Yet, though this is generally conceded, the guns which possess this power are so heavy, so expensive, and necessarily so few upon a vessel, and the conditions of a combat at sea are so different from target practice, that the great naval powers of the world are continuing, and probably will continue, to build armor-clad vessels. Lieutenant Jaques, one of the most accomplished officers of the United States Navy, in a pamphlet on this subject, published during the present year, says:

"To those who consider armor useless because the penetrating power of modern artillery is superior to the resistance of modern plates I would call attention to the fact that circumstances attending target practice on the proving grounds—the fire normal, guns on fixed platform, and the range only a few hundred feet—are very different from those in battle, where the range is great, the armor fitted to the fort or ship is constructed to present the least amount of normal surface, and the attacking gun and moving ship are ever changing their positions. According to Noble, one of the ablest English artilleryists, a thickness of armor equal to one-half the diameter of the projectile will insure almost certain impenetrability in the ever-varying conditions of a battle at sea."

But as at present circumstances it is of small moment to the United States whether the modern gun or modern armor is superior. We have neither the one nor the other—the gun mounted that can pierce an enemy's armor, no armor on a completed vessel or on a fort that can resist an enemy's guns.

Our heaviest granite wall is only 8 feet thick, while an 80-ton English gun has thrown a projectile through 25 feet of granite and cement. "No masonry can withstand such a fire. Even 75 feet of earth would probably not resist it, and if it would troops could not, without other protection, work the cannon under the galling fire of modern machine guns."

Then, after carefully comparing our Navy at that time with our Navy of 1860, and also with the principal navies of the world, the report proceeds:

If we study carefully the characteristics of the navies summarized in this appendix, we find that we are not only at the mercy of European nations, but that our neighbor, Brazil, might exact tribute of any city along our Gulf or Atlantic coast, while Chile could enforce similar demands on the shores of the Pacific.

The Riachuelo and Aquidaban, those formidable Brazilian armored cruisers, could steam, at 13 to 14 knots an hour, from Brazil to New York in ten days. These vessels could with impunity pass our forts and anchor in New York Harbor, but without doing this, their guns could easily throw shells into New York City from off Coney Island beach. The Chilean vessel Esmeralda carries coal enough to enable her to steam at 8 knots an hour from Chile to San Francisco without exhausting half her coal supply. With her high-power guns she could lie outside the Golden Gate and lay the city of San Francisco under contribution without going within the reach of its guns. The Cochrane and Blanco Encalada, other Chilean ships, are protected by 9 inches of iron armor, and carry batteries of six 8-inch breechloading rifles.

It is the unanimous opinion of your committee that the Government of the United States ought not longer to permit the lives and property of American citizens to be thus manifestly held at the mercy of so many foreign nations. We have therefore earnestly inquired what steps ought to be taken to increase our means of defense. In the present condition of maritime warfare, considering all proposed means of attack and defense, it is a grave question to decide in what proportions between the erection of fortifications and additions to our naval establishment expenditures should be divided. It is not our province to discuss that question. We suppose all will admit the value of forts and guns ashore. The nations of the Old World have expended vast sums in the erection of iron and steel clad forts, and they are continuing the work. Even for the uses of the Navy there must be harbors of refuge and safe anchorage must be provided where not only naval vessels, but those of the commercial marine may find shelter in time of war.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think that we had better carry out this promise, as it is the only one left in the platform that has not been violated.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. During the century of our national existence that will close on the 4th of March, our Navy has been engaged in war with France two years, with Tripoli four years, with Great Britain three years, with the Barbary powers seven years, with Mexico two years, and in the civil war four years.

In other words, gentlemen, while you say there is no danger of war, war is declared in these days by telegraph, by cable. You can not tell how soon we may have war. It is a fact that the English Government, following its usual practice, is to-day trying to establish a boundary in Alaska that would take from us the most valuable part of that recently acquired Territory. We can not tell when war may come upon us, and the only thing for the American people to do now and always is to keep up with the times. [Applause.] I do not claim that we ought to have a navy as large as the British navy. I do not claim that we ought to have a navy as large as the French navy. What I do say is that we ought to have a navy that, using the language of Admiral Walker, "would be able to meet any detachment of the English navy or the French navy or of any foreign navy that could be sent to our shores."

Gentlemen may think I am talking idly, but the English people are not idle. They are building forts all around us; they are establishing coaling stations all around us. The English Government is making more progress toward establishing substantial forts and reliable coaling stations on this continent than she is on the other.

Mr. MONEY. And more than we are doing on this continent.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Yes, sir; more than we are doing on this continent, as a matter of course, because of the mistaken policy we have been pursuing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, because as the eulogies on the late Senator Colquitt are to begin at 2 p. m., I think it proper to move that the committee do now rise in order that the House may have a few minutes for the transaction of routine business between now and that hour. I thank the members of the committee for their kind attention, and I move that the committee do now rise. [Loud applause.]

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago there was submitted to the House by the Speaker a Senate act donating some condemned cannon from the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., to the Iowa State Museum, at Des Moines, and it was referred by mistake to the Committee on Military Affairs. In reporting the bill back from that committee, I ask unanimous consent that it be now put upon its passage, as I think it can be disposed of in two or three minutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to supply the Iowa Historical Museum, Des Moines, Iowa, on the request of the governor, with two condemned cannon and one condemned seacoast mortar from the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, N. H., the State of Iowa to pay all the expenses of transportation, etc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BILOXI AND BACK BAY BRIDGE.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8459) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Biloxi and Back Bay Bridge Company to construct a bridge over that portion of the Bay of Biloxi, in the State of Mississippi, known as Back Bay."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the Biloxi and Back Bay Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge over that portion of the Bay of Biloxi, in the State of Mississippi, known as Back Bay," approved August 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: In section 6, line 2, strike out "one year" and insert instead thereof the words "two years."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOCKDALE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REAR-ADMIRAL J. H. RUSSELL.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 864, to authorize the payment to Rear-Admiral John H. Russell, of the United States Navy, of the highest pay of his grade.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the eminent and conspicuous services rendered by Rear-Admiral John H. Russell, of the United States Navy, retired, particularly in that on the night of September 13, 1861, while holding the rank of lieutenant, he voluntarily commanded an expedition of about 100 officers and men which destroyed the Confederate war vessel Judah, which was fully armed, manned, and equipped, and moored at the Pensacola Navy-Yard, in the presence of over 1,000 soldiers who were stationed at the yard, and in the face of numerous batteries, one-fifth of his command being either killed or wounded, he being among the latter, and in that he served faithfully and commendably during the subsequent years of the war of the rebellion in important commands and has never received any special promotion or advancement in numbers, said Rear-Admiral John H. Russell shall receive the highest pay of his grade.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have some explanation of the bill. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The report is quite long. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I object.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 8273) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, Mr. DUNPHY, and Mr. LOUD.

ASSISTANT ENGINEER, ETC., HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk. The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in addition to the sum of $300 to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for an assistant engineer and three additional laborers, under resolution of January 24, 1896, the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House, for the same purposes and at the same rates of pay, the further sum of $90.23.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know why this is presented.

Mr. SHELL. It is simply because of a mistake in the original resolution. We asked for the full amount, but the House passed the resolution for $300.

Mr. SAYERS. And with the expenditure of this sum the services of this man are concluded and paid for, I understand?

Mr. SHELL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I object.

THE LATE SENATOR COLQUITT.

The SPEAKER (at 2 o'clock p. m.). The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the third Saturday in February next, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the life of the Hon. Alfred H. Colquitt, late a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tribute to the memory of Alfred H. Colquitt, late a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a public servant, the House of Representatives, at the conclusion of these memorial services, adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question being taken, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Alfred Holt Colquitt was born in Walton County, Ga., April 20, 1824; graduated at Princeton College in the class of 1844; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1845; served as a staff officer with the rank of major during the war with Mexico; was elected and served as a member of the Thirty-third Congress; was a member of the Georgia legislature in 1859; was a Presidential elector for the State at large on the Breckinridge ticket in 1860; was a member of the secession convention of the State of Georgia; entered the Confederate army as captain; was subsequently chosen colonel of the Sixth Georgia Infantry; served as brigadier-general and was commissioned as a major-general; was elected governor of the State in 1876 and reelected to that office; at the expiration of his term as governor he was elected to the Senate of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1883, and was reelected in 1888.

Such was his own account of his life. Though modest, it outlines a career of great distinction, beginning early and terminating only at his death. It omits any mention of his successes at college, his deeds of gallantry in two wars, and his great triumphs in his political campaigns, though sometimes hotly contested. Nor does this sketch contain even an allusion to his ministries in the pulpit and all the enterprises of the Methodist Church, though these pious offices were performed while he was governor and Senator. In one of his last speeches in the Senate he closed with the exclamation:

Righteousness exalteth a nation!

It is interesting to note how closely he followed the footsteps of his distinguished father, Walter T. Colquitt. The latter was also educated at Princeton College, was a lawyer of great reputation, was a judge of the superior court, a general of militia, a member of the general assembly of the State, a Representative in Congress, a member of the Senate of the United States, and a minister of the Methodist Church. The careers of the father and son are so nearly identical that they form chapters in the same story. The line of the one's life seems to have been a prolongation of that of the other. Let us hope that the son of Alfred H. Colquitt may be worthy of his lineage and that an honorable name may become a part of the inheritance in this family.

I leave to others more intimately acquainted with Senator Colquitt the highest office of a friend, an affectionate tribute to his private traits and virtues and a minute detail of the elements of his character and conduct. His manhood began in affluence; he died poor. He had no extravagant habits, and in a money-loving age he was content with a moderate living, and never repined over the great losses entailed by an unsuccessful war. The pathetic devotion of his family during his long affliction was the fittest reward for his own generous solicitude as husband and father. He lived in a historic era, and in all its mighty movements he occupied leading positions. And amid them all, with their great anxieties and temptations, he seems to have professed that highest ideal of life which covets public confidence for the opportunities it affords for usefulness, and yet reverently worships God! We call our departed friend to witness that such a scheme of life is consistent with the loftiest courage in the hour of battle, the most enduring public favor, and the serene fortitude of a Christian in the article of death!

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to be associated with Senator Colquitt for about eight years in the other House of Congress, and although not intimately acquainted in a general sense, yet there was a consanguinity of views between us upon certain great lines of thought and action which gave me a feeling of nearness and almost of kinship, which did not require frequent expression in order that both might understand its existence. I therefore drop my sprig of evergreen upon his grave to-day with the feeling that I, too, have lost a brother.

Others more familiar with the details of his record have already explained them and in both of these great halls of legislation have pronounced in fitting terms that eulogy which belongs to those whose illustrious lives deserve immortality among their fellow-men. My tribute may well be brief and such as one gives spontaneously and aside as he moves silently in the procession to the tomb of the beloved.

Senator Colquitt was a distinctively elevating force in the Senate and throughout the country. Modest and unpretending to the last degree, yet firm and full of assertion when important principles were involved, he was felt even though unheard, and when occasion imperatively demanded his voice would fill the Chamber like the tones of Paul at Mars' Hill.

He seldom spoke at his best except upon some theme which aroused the moral and religious side of his nature, and then it was that his wonderful organization revealed the full power of the physical, intellectual, and moral elements of human nature in combined and harmonious action. At such times he was eloquent in the highest sense, and his power over the Senate and over popular audiences was very great.

The inspiration of the occasion would overcome all reserve, and the great cause would seem to transform him into a superior being. While in the Senate he spoke repeatedly and with great power upon the evils of intemperance and in support of Sabbath observance, as well as upon education and kindred subjects, and I think it will be admitted that the influence he exerted in favor of these fundamental and everlasting human interests will constitute his chief, as they certainly will his undeniable, claim to the gratitude of posterity.

I well remember the unfailing support which the Senators from Georgia, the empire State of the South, always gave to the education bill, and that Mr. Colquitt was very anxious for its success. Few men more than he comprehended the calamity involved in its failure. Senator Brown also, one of the great statesmen of our generation, has placed on record speeches and sentiments upon the same vast theme which in coming time, when the events of our day can be faithfully written and their relative importance seen in just perspective, will embalm his memory in the gratitude of the ages.

Senator Brown was the great plebeian whose native force carried him to the summit of attainment and power among his fellow-men in the hard attrition and competition of free institutions.

Senator Colquitt was the son of wealth and social position, the representative of that great patrician element which constituted the most remarkable aristocracy of history.

These men were the most perfectly connected and yet contrasted illustration that I have known in their harmonious and full-orbed action as Senators of their State of the extraordinary manner in which our system of theoretically free Government blends the activities and interests of every grade and class of men into one grand unity of action, of progress, and of elevation to all.

This power of reconciling the warring classes and conditions of men was the one thing lacking in the institutions of Greece and Rome, and those republics fell.

But who shall pretend to say whether Franklin, the plebeian, or Jefferson, the patrician, contributed the most to the foundation of American liberty? And it is because the principles which they promulgated and the institutions which embodied their teachings possess this power of drawing all men unto themselves that our Republic shall be everlasting.

I can never forget the last time I saw Senator Colquitt. It was not long before his death. Stricken and disabled, he was making his way on the little vehicle which was used to enable him to move about in the open air and between his residence and the Senate. He was then on his way to the scene of duty. We had not met for a considerable time, and then both were in full health and strength. But little was said, and the interview was not in words.

I encouraged him with all the hopeful suggestions that I could think of, and he smiled and talked bravely of the restoration to come. But neither deceived the other, and those great eyes blazing with a fixed and far-off penetration showed clearly that the light of another world was painting its realities upon his sensitive spirit. We knew that we had thought some thoughts and attempted some deeds together, and that an immortal sympathy was born of our association. But for this world we then knew that it was all over. He is the better off. Rest to his ashes! Everlasting bliss to his soul! Let us take up our burden and move on.

Mr. LAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope that some one more competent than myself to speak of the life and character of Senator Colquitt will seize this opportunity to do so. I never had the good fortune to enjoy an intimate and confidential acquaintanceship with him; we lived far apart, and our different lines of employment seldom brought us together. I was more intimately associated with him and had better opportunities to acquaint myself with his personal characteristics during the last months of his life than ever before. During those few months I daily met with him and his amiable and excellent family, who had come here to minister to the infirmities of his latter days.

But I, like every Georgian, could not fail to know of his public career as a soldier and statesman, and as a trusted and honored governor and Senator, strongly intrenched in the love and confidence of the people of Georgia, his native State.

Senator Colquitt was ushered into life upon an elevated plane. Few have been so fortunate in their birth as he. His father was a man of great distinction as an orator, lawyer, Senator of the United States, and last, but not least, as a minister of the gospel. In the traditions cherished by the old men of Georgia the fame of his father as a successful criminal lawyer and as a political debater on the hustings is not exceeded by that of any one of the great men who were his contemporaries. He is thought by many to have been the equal in many respects of Toombs, Stephens, Johnson, and Cobb, who subsequently attained to the zenith of their fame.

Senator Colquitt descended from such a father, and inheriting many of his personal traits, it is said, was also the recipient of a liberal education, having graduated from Princeton, N. J., a college which at that period stood in the front ranks of the institutions of learning and which yet preserves a high reputation. After his graduation he espoused the profession of law, and no one probably ever had spread out before him a future more fruitful of splendid achievements and honorable successes.

Judging from his industry, singleness of purpose, and consecration to duty, as manifested in his subsequent career, we may assume that he would have become an ornament to his profession had he submitted to its severe exactions and worshiped at the shrine of Justice instead of Mars. But the literature of Coke and Blackstone and the search for dull and musty precedents could not enchain his ardent temperament and martial spirit when the music of drum and life summoned patriots to arms.

Laying aside his law books and foregoing the laurels to be won before courts and juries, he hurried to Mexico, where the honor of his country and the chivalry of its soldiery were to be sustained and illustrated on the field of battle. Bravely and gallantly performing his part on this arena and flushed with the victories that everywhere crowned the American arms, at the close of the war he returned to his native State, and instead of resuming his chosen profession preferred rather the peaceful though no less dignified occupation of a farmer.

Nothing recorded in ancient or modern history is comparable to the ease and luxury enjoyed by a Southern planter at that period. His happy condition elicited the envy of the world, an envy which many mistook for philanthropy. To be the proprietor of broad and fertile acres, cultivated by African slaves who never felt the severities of cold, hunger, and nakedness, as do many of the suffering poor of the present day, who gave themselves to the pleasures of to-day without bestowing a thought on the needs of to-morrow, who never suffered the lack of any substantial good, whose happiness and contentment were only surpassed by the bounteous hospitality that nourished them, and whose love and devotion to the master were only equaled by that of his children, was indeed a princely heritage.

Such was the happy fortune of Senator Colquitt in his early manhood and until the suffrages of a free and confiding constituency called him while yet a young man to represent them in the House of Representatives of the United States. And having honorably discharged the duties required in that station he, unlike the ambitious statesmen of the present day, declined to serve them longer, preferring the "quiet shades of a private life." Here in pastoral simplicity and in the felicity of domestic and social virtues he spent the passing years until a strenuous call to a higher duty bade him renounce the pleasures of home and fireside to enter upon an arena of more arduous effort.

When he, in common with all Georgians, became convinced that the Government of our fathers was about to be overthrown and the principles of liberty engulfed in the mad tide of fanaticism then raging, and unhappily not entirely yet subsided, he yielded to the manly instincts of his nature and urged upon his countrymen the propriety of a peaceable secession from those with whom they could not live in honorable equality and amity. The wisdom and rectitude of his conduct in this matter is left without further remark to the judgment of future generations and impartial history. His countrymen with one accord followed his advice, and when it was perceived that the great questions then at issue must be submitted to the arbitrament of arms he was among the first to enlist in a cause then supposed to be not only just, but in accord with every principle of liberty and of a righteous self-defense.

Entering the Confederate army as a captain he passed through all gradations successively until he reached the rank of a major-general, and in all gradations and at all times scrupulously performed all the duties of a soldier and a patriot. Of his military record it is unnecessary to speak more. Suffice it that he never shrank from the hardships of the camp nor shunned danger in the field, and that his skill in "plucking victory from defeat" was so conspicuously displayed on one occasion as to win for him the title of the "Hero of Olustee." His devotion never wavered until the Confederacy ceased to be numbered among the nations of the earth; its prodigies of achievement availed not its triumph, but won for it an epitaph of lofty sentiment.

No nation e'er rose so white and fair,
Nor fell so pure of crime.

Returning after defeat, he resumed his occupation of farming. But its former pleasures and happiness had vanished. The prosperity that rested on the blossoming fields and plenteous harvests of the South had departed. The silent specters of ruin and desolation mocked the eye on every hand. Yet Senator Colquitt, with the same heroism that marked his military career, set about the rehabilitation of his desolated country. His countrymen recognizing his zeal in the promotion of agriculture and confiding in his wisdom and fidelity, called him to the presidency of their State Agricultural Society. His field of usefulness was thus widened; his wise counsels, deriving authority and dignity from his official position, were more potent, whereby a braver and more intelligent spirit was infused into the community of planters. New life and hope sprang up, and under the auspices of that society the agriculture of Georgia has been advanced until it will compare favorably with any State in the Union.

From the head of that society Senator Colquitt was elected to the chief magistracy of the State for two successive terms—the first term without opposition. In that great office, as everywhere, he held the confidence of the people. They believed him honest, they knew him loyal, and hence they trusted him. He did not disappoint them. Their interests were secure in his keeping. His administration of that great office was untarnished, and if he committed mistakes they were of the head and not of the heart. His purpose was always to do right.

At the close of his second term as governor he was elected to the Senate of the United States, and reelected at the expiration of his term. The people demanded his continual advancement in office, but no elevation of station ever raised him so high that he forgot them. It was in their service and during a session of the Congress that he suffered a stroke of paralysis that eventually removed him from the stage of action. But notwithstanding his disability and though suffering intensely physically, he stood at the post of duty with unwavering fealty until death carried him hence. He died with his armor on, and truly it may be said of him, as of the heavenly orbs—

The stars go down
To rise on some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

Mr. Speaker, the life of such a man is a benediction to mankind. Reared in affluence, occupying by inheritance the highest social position, and through a long life the favored child of fortune, yet he was simple and unaffected in his habits, courtly and gracious in his manners, stainless in private life, robust in manly virtues, adorned with the Christian graces, lofty in his aspirations, and responsive to every duty. These accomplishments constituted the ideal man.

It is true that he was a politician. He had a profound knowledge of the people and their modes of thought, the subtle motives that influence them and the agencies by which they are controlled. He saw from afar the coming changes in political sentiment and action and thus was enabled to guide where he could not control the political activities of the people. He felt a deep and earnest sympathy with the people and sincerely desired to promote every agency that would conduce to their advantage and improvement. In this he was perhaps as disinterested as the frailty of our nature will permit us to be.

He was also a partisan—a true and loyal Democrat. He had a supreme conviction in the rectitude of its principles and in the adaptation of those principles to every political exigency. He could not be neutral, nor was it possible to persuade him that any tenet in opposition to Democratic principles could be sound. He might tolerate, but could not sanction any principle of the opposition. For these reasons his party confided in and loved and honored him. No man could supplant him in their affections. To the last hour of his life they were as loyal to him as he was to them. The calamity that befell him overwhelmed them with grief, and for months prior to his demise they joyfully welcomed every rumor indicating the probable restoration of his health.

Senator Colquitt espoused and daily exemplified the sublime doctrines of the Christian religion. They were an anchor to his faith, both sure and steadfast. His profession was not put on for display; it was not a garment to be worn and laid aside at pleasure; it was the symbol of a deep and earnest conviction that had become ingrained and integrated with his character. He inculcated these doctrines from the rostrum and the pulpit, and illustrated them in his arduous efforts in aid and encouragement of every religious and educational movement.

In office Senator Colquitt "pursued the noiseless tenor of his way." He did not court notoriety nor shun responsibility, but was equal to the discharge of every duty. He may not have been the intellectual equal of some of his contemporaries, yet in sublime loyalty to duty, in undaunted moral and physical courage, and in full consecration to the interests of his people and country he had no superiors.

The memory of his beneficent deeds and noble achievements will be fondly cherished by the citizens of his native State, while his lofty character and enduring fame remain the heritage of mankind.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, to enter into the special details of the life and services of the eminent Senator whose memory we are here to-day to commemorate should be left to those of his State who have had the honor and privilege of a lifelong association, and I shall only speak of him as he was known to the people of his neighboring States.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia, Alfred Holt Colquitt, was a great and a good man. In all the exigencies of life he adorned and graced every position he was called upon to occupy. He was eminently one of those men who did his full duty in every activity in which it pleased God to place him.

When the shadow of death passed over his form there ended a blameless career, a life consecrated to the cause of Christianity, to the good of the people of his State, and to the entire country. Whether bravely leading his soldiers to victory on the plains of Mexico or engaging in almost continuous battle as a major-general in the late war, he conducted himself with the most admirable and untiring fortitude. As governor of the State he loved so well, or representing his people in this Hall of Congress or in the Senate Chamber of the United States, he was always the same, conscientious and devoted in the discharge of his every duty, and both by teaching and by example doing all in his power to fill the fullest measure of his calling.

As a general he successfully sought to inspire the brave men he led to the exercise of the highest type of courage, as a statesman he used the strongest efforts to add to the happiness and prosperity of his fellow-beings, and as a citizen he exerted the great influence he possessed to create a religious and moral sentiment among those who had the good fortune to enjoy his association.

General Colquitt possessed an abiding and unquestioning faith in the immortality of the soul taught by the Christian religion, and believed that a life spent in elevating the moral character and promoting the happiness and welfare of his fellow-beings would, in the world to come, realize the promises to the good and faithful servants of our Lord. To a man like this death could have no terrors, but would come as the beginning of eternal happiness. The grave could have no sting, but be the open door to a better, a perfect, and everlasting life.

His death is an irreparable loss to his devoted family, to his State, which loved and honored him, and to his entire country, which so sorely needs the services of such men as Alfred Holt Colquitt.

[Mr. TATE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter which has caused a great deal of comment in the North that the people of the South should have so persistently put forward for political preferment the men who fought against the Union in the great war of the rebellion. Common gratitude and common comradeship for the men who stood together in a great contest like that scarcely explains the steady persistence with which the people of the South have heaped honors almost exclusively upon the men of the South who fought in that great war on their side. Because, notwithstanding the general principles of comradeship to which I have referred, there intervenes always the ambition of men to hold high office and to occupy the positions of leadership, which overcomes the sentiment of gratitude, and leads to division, at least, of the honors and emoluments of public favor.

And yet, during all these years, now a period of a full average generation of men, we find the people of the South have made a record of unflinching loyalty to the men who fought for their cause, and have selected them for leadership in peace and to receive the honors of civil life.

But when you come to make something more than a cursory and imperfect examination of the record it transpires that there have been later events and more recent conditions which are more satisfactory in explaining the circumstances to which I have referred.

The men who in 1865, returning from the fruitless effort for Southern independence, laid hold upon the shattered fragments of material things in the South, and led in the first demonstrations of effort to retrieve the unfortunate past, are the men, after all, to whom the loyalty and love of the people of the South have been manifested. It is a fact that the men who gathered together these broken fragments and pushed forward on the line of rehabilitation were in large part the men who fought for the overthrow of the Union and the establishment of the Confederacy, for it is true and has been over and over again admitted, and never successfully denied, that in the great cotton States of the South there was but a vestige of loyalty to the Union when war was actually precipitated, and there was a great percentage of the men of that section who went with all the force of their abilities into the war of the rebellion. It was a popular demonstration. It may not have been the result of calm and deliberate judgment. It certainly was the outbreak of a fury of error. We have ceased to call the great rebellion a crime because it is not wise to promote and perpetuate sectional strife, and we join heartily, we of the North, in declaring that no more shall—

The war clouds sever;
Nor the winding river be red, and that we will from henceforth and forever, proud of our own loyalty to the Government, mindful of the men who stood on our side of the battle, yet waive all crimination and recrimination, and work together for the obliteration of the wounds of the past. Waiving nothing of our love for loyalty, yielding nothing of our denunciation for disloyalty in the abstract, we will nevertheless do what we can to obliterate all, excepting the lessons of the past. Those we must cherish.

But what a task lay before the people of the South! The men of the North returned to their homes amid the acclamations of millions who joined to do them honor for having stood by the Union; and the shouts of triumph, the cheers for victory, were the sweetest notes of their reception. And they found no desolation of homes. There were hearts broken; there were dismembered families and ruined firesides, the homes of parents and children, wives, mothers, and sweethearts; but there was a restored country and the triumph of loyalty, and the prosperity of material things.

How was it with the men of the South, conquered in battle? I can not discuss the why or the wherefore. I will not admit the Southern claim that it was because of numbers, nor will I taunt the Southern man with the claim so often put up that it was our superior fighting qualities; nor will I yet in this presence and in this connection proclaim that it was solely and alone the judgment and wisdom of Almighty God arrayed on our side. I will not waive the honors due to my comrades for having earned the magnificent victory by ascribing it to the inevitable and overshadowing power of the Almighty. Driven to an expression upon that question I would insist that the valor of my countrymen, the integrity of my comrades, had something to do with the victory, however much Divine Providence may have willed our success. The great work was not alone due to either influence.

But the returning Union man found his roof-tree still over his head. He found the material prosperity of his section practically unimpaired, and in many instances enormously enhanced. He found the machinery of Government in full operation, and no uncertainty as to the future status of the citizen.

How was it with the Southern men? Thousands found their homesteads gone. Tens of thousands found themselves bankrupt and practically ruined. They found anarchy instead of government. They found desolation instead of prosperity. They found the civil government destroyed. They found uncertainty everywhere. A few of their leaders ran—fled from the country. They found a condition, to summarize, without further detail, such as was sufficient to overwhelm with despair the stoutest-hearted men. The men who had with unparalleled chivalry followed the leadership of others into the rebellion, stood demanding that the leaders who had precipitated the rebellion should devise some means of extrication from the conditions that surrounded them. Those of us who were in the South when the war had ended will join in saying that the wisest statesman, the most courageous citizen, would have been helpless to have attempted to devise a scheme of extrication that would have merited and received the approbation of any considerable number of the people. A proud-spirited people had first to make its suggestion in the light of its material overthrow upon the battlefield; and then it had to hear from the victorious other side as to what would be acceptable as terms of peace.

It may be said that the condition of war was one of awful responsibility and awful perplexity; but I say that the period of reconstruction was a period of greater perplexity and greater uncertainty to the honest men of both sides than was the condition of war. In war time we knew what we were to do. We were to march, and bivouac, and fight. In reconstruction times the wisest did not know what to do. No rule of law hitherto decided applied to the questions of that hour or had wise application to the conditions surrounding us.

Had we been dealing with our enemies there would have been no trouble. The laws of war fixed the conditions. The conditions should be the will of the victor—the vanquished not to be consulted. But they were not our enemies; they were our brethren. Our future was bound up in their future. If we were to prosper in the future they must prosper in the future; if they were to be crushed in the future we were to suffer for that. I maintain that the great wisdom shown by the dominant party in this country in the treatment of these great questions is to-day, looking back on it in the light of all its imperfections, yet an exhibition of profound statesmanship.

But what of the men of the South? They were driven to rebuild their destroyed homes, and to them was assigned the task of reconstructing State governments. Theirs to bring back into the symmetry of governmental organization the fragments that they found around them. The leaders were to inspire hope, confidence, and patriotism in the minds of the overthrown. They were to teach the men who returned from the battlefields that despair was not the attitude commensurate with American character. They were to rally the great body of the people of the South to bring forth out of the ashes around them, phoenix-like, if possible, a new South and a new American form of government. How well they have done this, time will tell.

There is one thing that they have done that we know now: they have organized the Southern section of the United States to be loyal and true to the American flag—loyal and faithful to the Constitution of the Union. Ready and willing, now and always, to protect and defend and vindicate the American flag. That they have accomplished this with the surrounding conditions is a testimonial to the character of the men who did it that my words can not improve upon.

Little wonder, then, it is, that the people of the South idolize, not alone nor especially the men who led them in battle, but they idolize and worship the men who, out of the fire of battle, out of the smoke and carnage of war, came forth to gather up and lead the people of the South along the pathway they have traveled; and looking about them now upon the peaceful homes of the South, the exaltation of law and order and good government, the obliteration of that blighting curse of slavery, the restitution of the law of the land, the erection of splendid educational institutions, the building up of industries, the growth of national pride and national loyalty, is it any wonder that the men of the South turn to the men who led them through this Red Sea of trouble out into the Promised Land of happiness and prosperity?

Alfred Holt Colquitt was one of these leaders. He had taken an active and brilliant share in the war for the overthrow of the Union. Misled as he was, his conduct upon the field of battle, in common with the brave men of his section, will ever be a monument to the success of the armies of the people of the North. When we applaud our own courage, our own chivalry, our own success, in the light of Gettysburg, and Chickamauga, and Vicksburg, and Shiloh, and Peach Tree Creek, and Fort Fisher, we eulogize the courage, the chivalry, and the devotion of our enemies.

Colquitt was a citizen soldier, but he believed in war as an arbitrator. He fought in the Mexican war, and shed luster upon the escutcheon of his native State. He fought in the war of the rebellion, and sacrificed wealth, ease, and everything upon the altar of a mistaken loyalty to the South. He was one of the first to recognize surrounding conditions; and however heroic he may have been at Olustee, however gallant upon the battlefields of Mexico, his gallantry in those actions counts for little to me as compared with the heroic efforts he made to restore good government to his State after the war. He was one of the gallant leaders of that return to good sense, good government, and prosperity. He was one of the men who took hold of the burning brands and extinguished the flames. He was one of the men who rallied the insurgents from lethargy, from despair, from vindictiveness, and gathered them into organized bands of citizens returning to loyalty; doing the work of loyalists; laying their hands upon the structure they had sought to tear down to build it up; bringing the stones they had taken out of the temple, and replacing them therein; coming back with the flag they had sought to dishonor—bringing it back as the flag of their country. I accord to the dead Senator my meed of praise, and I wonder not that in the politics of his own great Empire State of the South he was more invincible than the greatest leader of the rebellion was invincible on the battlefield.

Men of the United States—my countrymen—over the bier of this dead statesman, this heroic insurgent in the hour of rebellion, I stand to accord to his memory a word, a tribute of honest congratulation. In the South his memory will be ever endeared by all the phases of his life and all the epochs of his career; and in the North, drawing the veil of oblivion upon the one epoch, his fame as an American citizen will be ever cherished as a part of the history of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the gallant sons of Georgia in dropping a tear of love and affection upon the new-made grave of Alfred Holt Colquitt.

[Mr. MADDOX addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker, we come at this hour to speak a word for our dead. No praise or censure can affect him in memory of whom we lift our voices to-day. The lesson of his life, like the lesson of the lives of all men, is for the living. Merely to have lived and to have died, to have moved through the short span of life, teaches nothing except that fact imprinted on the face of nature to be seen of all men that there is a life and a death. But good deeds and a life that exemplifies the virtuous qualities implanted by the Author of all good in the human mind make that valuable tribute to humanity that gives a life its value to the world, and gives good title to fame and immortality to which men aspire.

Born in the State of Georgia on the 20th of April, 1844, Alfred H. Colquitt, after a lifetime spent upon her soil and in her service, died and was buried among his own people in April, 1894.

The environments of his birth and the circumstances of his childhood were such that he could and did imbibe those social and humanitarian qualities which adorn the neighbor and good citizen and contribute as well to the formation of personal and independent manhood. This character was his by inheritance and education.

In early manhood we find him where his country called him, a soldier fighting with patriotic fervor on the plains of Mexico, and while still young serving his State and country in the Halls of Congress.

With his State and his people in soul and sentiment in the great struggle in the war of secession, with much to lose and nothing to gain save to serve the right as he saw it, he met the issue with fortitude and courage, regarding wealth and life only proper sacrifices to his cause. First in the conflict and the last to leave it, as a soldier and as commander of soldiers his record was brilliant and without a blemish. The hard-fought fields of Virginia and the historic battle of Olustee are monuments of his well-earned fame.

Laying aside the implements of war, with nothing saved but honor, the citizen soldier resumes his civic duties with a perfect adjustment to the conditions.

His people called him to their service, and as chief magistrate of his State he served his State for a number of years, and was then delegated a Senator of the United States, where he ended his earthly career on the 6th of April, 1894.

He served his people. They honored him living and mourn him dead. In the pantheon devoted to illustrious memories we place his name.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, while my physical condition seems to forbid that I should to-day undertake to make any remarks on any subject, such was my admiration for the great Senator from Georgia that I feel impelled to say at least a few words of one who lived so well and died so nobly.

Born and raised in Georgia, I learned in my boyhood days to honor the name of Colquitt. The name of Walter T. Colquitt I remember as a "household word." But Alfred H. Colquitt it was my privilege to know well. I knew him best as a soldier. During the siege at Charleston, S. C., I was temporarily under his command. On James Island and at Battery Wagner I have seen him when over 800 of the heaviest guns known to the United States Army and Navy were scattering their deadly missiles over the heads of the Confederate forces. Often have I seen his person covered by the smoke and dust of exploding shells; and always when the sea breezes would drive the smoke away, Gen. Alfred H. Colquitt could be seen at his post of duty where the firing was heaviest, exhibiting to his devoted soldiers the fact that he asked of them the performance of no duty in which he himself did not personally and conspicuously engage. At the battle of Olustee, in Florida, which the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, General HAWLEY, says, in his speech in the Senate on the 8th of January last, "was the bloodiest battle in which he participated during the war," it was my privilege to command a brigade of Georgians, which, together with Colquitt's brigade and a few detached regiments and batteries, constituted the Confederate forces engaged in that battle. It was in February, 1864, in the open pine woods of Florida that I saw General Colquitt form his brigade and at its head move into action; and for six long hours, seated upon his "old gray," did he, with face to the foe, command and direct the movements which resulted in a glorious victory to the Confederate arms.

During those "times which tried men's souls" I was much with General Colquitt, in camp as well as on the field. I then and there learned not only to admire and honor his gallantry as a soldier, but to love and esteem his beautiful Christian character and his devoted and lofty patriotism. A man of strong convictions, he had the courage to carry them into execution. A constant follower of his great Redeemer, he so interwove the beautiful Christian graces into his character as to render gentle the heart of a soldier and to keep the statesman always a suppliant for Divine guidance and assistance.

Truly a great man has fallen; and Alabama, Georgia's eldest daughter, joins her mother in placing a sprig of acacia on his grave, and would urge the young men of our country to emulate his noble example.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, it is to me a pleasing duty to join with my colleagues on this floor in paying this last tribute to Senator Alfred H. Colquitt, a noble man, with a noble ancestry. I became intimately acquainted with Senator Colquitt soon after the close of the late war between the States, when Georgia was devastated, when poverty and disorder ruled throughout our section of the country. It was then I began to admire him and love him. He was a Georgian in every sense of the word; yet his heart was warm enough and his mind broad enough to take in all classes and all sections of this great country.

He was born, Mr. Speaker, in the county adjoining that in which I was born. He lived the greater part of his official life in the Congressional district that I have the honor to represent. I was with him in every political campaign in which he was ever interested after the war. I was with him and for him in each and every one. I knew him, Mr. Speaker, in his private life—at his home, with his family, and with his friends. I knew him in the political caucus. I knew him on the hustings before the people. I knew him in his official life as governor of the State. I knew him before he was governor of Georgia when he undertook to gather together and lift up, with the help of others, the remnants that were left in that downtrodden section of the country—the South, especially his own State, and undertook after the issues of the war were past to revive and restore the prosperity and happiness of that people.

Senator Colquitt, as has been well said, was one of the most remarkable politicians that this country ever produced—astute, far-seeing, and far-reaching in his comprehension of political events and their relation to the people and their effect upon the public. Never, perhaps, in his life was he defeated on a political issue when he was directly interested or when he directly controlled it. He was a partisan, as his father as well as his grandfather was before him—strictly a partisan; yet one thing could be said of him in his political relation with parties, that to perhaps the fullest possible extent he was pure in his politics. He was fair and considerate, honorable and just in his political measures and affiliations.

Mr. Speaker, he was very much endeared to the masses of the people of Georgia. No man has lived or died in that State who was nearer to the great heart of the people of that Commonwealth than Alfred H. Colquitt. He was kind, he was liberal, he was sympathetic, he was obliging. His very nature warmed up to the demands of the common people. Every sympathy of his heart went out to the suffering, the poor, and the struggling masses of his State. While he was president of the State Agricultural Society I was intimately associated with him, being an officer under him. And it was remarkable, Mr. Speaker, to see the interest he took in the development of the great agricultural interest of the South. It is remarkable how he could comprehend the details that entered into the reviving of that interest in Georgia. It was remarkable to see the personal sacrifices that he made in endeavoring to build up that section and put it once more upon a plane of prosperity and advancement.

As a citizen, Mr. Speaker, everybody respected him; and none but those who were jealous of his power and his greatness dared to criticize him.

His official life has been referred to by some of my colleagues. Everybody in Georgia and everybody in the broad Union, after he became a United States Senator, knew where to find Alfred H. Colquitt on any question that presented itself to his mind for a conclusion. And never once—I am proud to say it—either in State action or in his action at the other end of this Capitol did he desert what he believed to be the true interests of the masses of this country. He was with the people and against the classes. He was for the people first, last, and all the time.

As a Christian gentleman he exercised a wonderful influence in my State and, indeed, in this entire country—indeed, sir, his name in that relation extended all over this world of ours. He is known to-day in China and Japan; he is revered and respected in England and Germany and France for the interest that he took in moral and religious reformations and enterprises. He was a man, Mr. Speaker, whom to know was to love. In his most intimate and private relations—and that is where we can best judge of the true man—he was always ready to do the right thing and to battle against what he believed to be wrong.

He lived for those that loved him,
For those that knew him true,
For heaven bright above him,
And for the good he could do.

For the cause that needed assistance,
For the wrongs that lacked resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And for the good he could do.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, that all gentlemen who have not spoken and who may desire to submit remarks upon the life and character of Senator Colquitt may be permitted to print such remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). In accordance with the terms of the resolutions heretofore adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Chair now declares the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I present, with a word of explanation, a memorial signed by 20,000 residents and taxpayers of southern California, nearly all of whom reside in Los Angeles County, requesting early and favorable action with reference to the construction of a breakwater at San Pedro, Cal., and the establishment of a deep-water harbor at that point.

Owing to commercial demands not only of a local, but likewise of a national character, the officers of this Government having such matters specially in charge, as well as both Houses of Congress, authorized an examination under the provisions of the river and harbor act of September 19, 1890, of the Pacific coast between Points Duma and Capistrano. The result of such examination is contained in House Executive Document No. 39, Fifty-second Congress, first session, the same being a report made by Colonel Mendell, Colonel Gillespie, and Colonel Benyard, of the Corps of Engineers. These gentlemen reported in favor of the construction of a harbor at San Pedro. Afterwards parties interested in the Santa Monica and other locations, being dissatisfied with the Mendell report, procured the insertion in the river and harbor bill approved July 13, 1892, of a provision directing the Secretary of War to appoint a suitable board of engineers to make a careful and critical examination for a proposed deep-water harbor at San Pedro or Santa Monica bays, and to report as to which is the more eligible location for such harbor, etc.

The board appointed pursuant to this statute consisted of Colonels Craighill, Robert, and Haines and Majors Raymond and Handbury, all of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army. These gentlemen, concurring with the previous board, unanimously selected San Pedro as the proper point for the proposed expenditure. (See House Executive Document No. 41, Fifty-second Congress, second session.)

Nevertheless it has been found impossible to reach a conclusion as to the location either in the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House or the Commerce Committee of the Senate. We authorized the Commerce Committee at the last session to visit the points involved and inspect the same, but circumstances prevented the trip. There has been no doubt from any source as to the desirability and necessity of this harbor construction, the sole question being as to the location. My colleague agrees with me that the harbor should be located at San Pedro. The member of Congress now representing that district [Mr. CANNON of California] is of the same opinion, and such also is the expressed view of the member-elect, Mr. McLachlan. The Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, a large and representative body, has reached the same conclusion. Much feeling has been developed in California because of the failure of Congress to act upon this subject, and this memorial is offered for the purpose of demonstrating that those who live in the immediate neighborhood and are cognizant of all surrounding details concur with the unvarying judgment of the army engineers. Local sentiment is overwhelming in this direction.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make a single suggestion about the resolution. As I have stated often here, the gold of the world is pooled.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me a moment?

Mr. STEWART. No; I wish to make merely a suggestion. I will get through in a moment.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator please, there is some important business pending that I think ought to be transacted this morning.

Mr. STEWART. I do not propose to occupy time. If the Senator had not interrupted me I would possibly have been through.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will let the resolution pass over without losing its place.

Mr. STEWART. No; I wish to make a single remark. I say we have charged repeatedly that the gold of the world is pooled. In reading over the contract recently made by the Secretary of the Treasury with the syndicate of foreign bankers I find that a part of the consideration is that they will not use their power to coerce or squeeze the Government until next October if they can have the advantages of the contract; and this is the consideration for the large bonus they have secured in the contract. This is the consideration for obtaining bonds for a premium of four and a fraction, when under the market price on the day the contract was made that class of bonds would be worth nineteen and a little over at the same rate of interest. This is paying a premium of 15 per cent for gold. This is the way the President maintains the parity of the two metals.

It seems to me that it ought now to be apparent to everybody that the gold is pooled. If they have the power to prevent the export of gold, to control the gold for nine months and not make another squeeze during that time, it shows that we are entirely in their power, and it puts the United States in the most humiliating position of acknowledging that a gold combination have it by the throat, and that it must comply with their demands, however disastrous. The United States secures only a temporary peace until next October by paying the vast bonus. This demand comes in the language of the highwayman. What do the gold kings demand next October?

If they have that power over the country, the country ought to know it.

In view of that fact it shows how absurd it is for the people of the United States to depend upon this syndicate, this combination, for their circulating medium. If we continue to acknowledge that power as superior to the Government, as this contract does, it shows that this is a Government of a gold oligarchy and not a Government of the people. The idea that this great Government should be bound to pay millions to buy its peace for nine months, to make a humiliating contract, to submit to conditions that are perfectly ruinous!

I hope Senators will read the contract and see at what sacrifice the Government is made to buy its peace from its rulers, the gold kings, until next October. I hope the resolution will be read again at length.

Mr. GRAY. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. As a Senator has suggested, a part of the contract is to protect the United States. To protect the United States! What a humiliating position that we need the protection of a gold ring! Seventy million people in this great country have got to buy the protection of a gold ring!

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the resolution offered on Saturday by the Senator from Nevada opens up a very wide range of discussion on which I do not propose to embark in the morning hour. But I do propose to say a word or two in regard to the topics that were discussed at some length in the morning hour on Saturday. I do not take it that anything in the matter then before the Senate or in any topic suggested by the resolution of the Senator from Nevada to-day involves the question that has been debated so long and so earnestly on both sides, especially upon one side, as to whether silver shall be admitted to free coinage in the mints of the United States.

I do not believe that the question whether we should declare a policy that is consistent, as we believe, with honesty and absolutely necessary to the credit of our Government has anything to do with the vital question that separates those who believe in free-silver coinage by the United States alone and those who believe that it is not practicable to have free-silver coinage and maintain bimetalism unless in cooperation with the civilized powers of the world.

So I discard that topic and wish to say a word or two suggested by the remarks of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WORCOTT] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on Saturday. I do not know why a proposition such as that offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] should have been the occasion for such a violent assault upon the Administration as was made by the Senator from Massachusetts. After the very able and lucid explanation of the situation given by the Senator from New York and the argument he made, which was a persuasive one, in favor of the adoption of his resolution, I do not believe that there was anything to provoke the attack, which, to use the expression that was used quite frequently on Saturday, seemed to me a "wanton" one on the Administration and on the President of the United States for negotiating a purchase of gold by the issue of the bonds of the United States, as it has been explained to us by his recent message.

It is impossible to do justice to that transaction, to do that ordinary and common justice which as Senators of the United States and as patriotic citizens we are bound to do the humblest public servitor who is discharging a public duty, unless we understand something of the situation that was presented to the President of the United States when that negotiation was consummated, the details of which he has sent promptly to the Senate, and which we have now before us.

The President had devolved upon him by an expression of the legislative will more than once repeated that it was the policy of the United States Government in all its branches, executive as well as legislative, to preserve the parity between the two monetary metals of gold and silver. That duty was instant, it was constant; the President could not avoid it or evade it without a dereliction on his part that would have subjected him to the criticism and the animadversion, if not something worse, of the Congress of the United States and of the people of this country. There was no other mode, and I think it will be admitted on all sides that there is no other mode at the present time—whatever theory Senators may have in regard to the relation of gold and silver and the capacity of a readmission of silver to free coinage alone, to bring it up to a parity with gold—I say, it must be admitted that in the situation that then confronted the Administration, in order to perform that duty charged upon it by the Congress of the United States, the only thing it could do was to be ready at all times in the Treasury to maintain the absolute exchangeability of silver for gold, and to see to it that no demand should be made for either metal that was not instantly responded to by the fiscal agent of this great Government. If there is any other mode by which that parity could be preserved I have not heard it suggested.

The President has not sought to take this enormous and onerous responsibility on his own shoulders without the cooperation of the legislative branch of the Government. When we assembled here in December his message brought this matter to the attention of both Houses, and we were called upon to come to the assistance of the Secretary of the Treasury in performing this grave duty and assisting to restore the disordered finances not only of the Government, but also of the country at large.

A bill was outlined in his message which was promptly brought before the House of Representatives, discussed, debated, and rejected. Again the President of the United States, in the stress that was brought upon him, appealed to Congress in the message, which we all recollect, of January 28, calling our attention, as he was in duty bound to call our attention, to the condition of disorder in the finances and business relations of this great country. He said, among other things:

It is hardly disputed that this predicament confronts us to-day.

That is where, with natural resources unlimited, our progress was checked by false financial policy and the heedless disregard of sound monetary laws.

Therefore, no one in any degree responsible for the making and execution of our laws should fail to see a patriotic duty in honestly and sincerely attempting to relieve the situation.

I do not think that the junior Senator from Massachusetts will find it in his heart to criticize that appeal as otherwise than a patriotic one.

Manifestly this effort will not succeed unless it is made untrammelled by the prejudice of partisanship and with a steadfast determination to resist the temptation to accomplish party advantage.

What view the Senator from Massachusetts to whom I have alluded takes of that expression I do not know, except so far as I am at liberty to infer from the tenor and tone of his remarks on Saturday. Whether he resisted that temptation the country will judge.

The real trouble which confronts us consists in a lack of confidence, widespread and constantly increasing, in the continuing ability or disposition of the Government to pay its obligations in gold. This lack of confidence grows to some extent out of the palpable and apparent embarrassment attending the efforts of the Government under existing laws to procure gold, and to a greater extent out of the impossibility of either keeping it in the Treasury or canceling obligations by its expenditure after it is obtained.

Mr. President, did he not there touch the very point of this difficulty? Did he not there allude to the very situation which we have made it his solemn duty to meet, to consider, and to redress?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator think that confidence in the ability of the United States to maintain financial independence will be augmented by hiring the protection of a foreign syndicate for a limited term at an enormous sacrifice?

Mr. GRAY. I am coming to that in a moment if the Senator will just wait. I heard the Senator say that on Saturday.

Mr. STEWART. It is going to be said again several times. It can not be said too often.

Mr. GRAY. The situation the President was called upon to deal with was just what he has stated, and I do not think any Senator will take issue with him as to the matter of fact, that—

This lack of confidence grows to some extent out of the palpable and apparent embarrassment attending the efforts of the Government under existing laws to procure gold, and to a greater extent out of the impossibility of either keeping it in the Treasury or canceling obligations by its expenditure after it is obtained.

The only way left open to the Government for procuring gold is by the issue and sale of its bonds.

I think we will agree there.

The only bonds that can be so issued were authorized nearly twenty-five years ago, and are not well calculated to meet our present needs.

The President called upon us by that statement to come to his aid and relieve him from just the situation in which he found himself on the 13th day of this month—that there was no legal authorization for the issue of bonds for the purchase of gold except an act passed twenty-five years ago, and not well calculated to meet our present needs.

Among other disadvantages, they are made payable in coin, instead of specifically in gold, which, in existing conditions, detracts largely and in an increasing ratio from their desirability as investments.

I did not hear the junior Senator from Massachusetts criticize the message when that message came in for stating the very fact which, when consummated in the negotiation of the 13th of this month, called for such scathing animadversion on his part. The President told us on the 13th of February that the difficulty with the law under which he was obliged to act was that it did not provide for a bond payable specifically in gold. What he was called to do was not to issue bonds to pay current expenses of the Government; it was not to borrow money to pay debts of the United States; it was to purchase gold coin in order that he might be able to perform the duty imposed upon him by the Congress of the United States, to wit, to preserve the parity between the two metals of gold and silver.

This is not an ordinary situation in which the Government resorts to the money market in order to anticipate revenues in order to meet failing revenues, but it was to meet a situation; it was a scheme, an arrangement, by which the deportation of gold might be stopped and the temptation taken away from the people of the United States to withdraw from the vaults of the Treasury, for the purposes of hoarding, the gold coin which had heretofore been kept in that place.

Mr. President, that I am right in this description of the situation, so far as I have gone, I think can be asserted without fear of successful contradiction. Having thus appealed to the Congress of the United States, having laid before this Senate and the other branch of Congress the situation, with a fullness of detail that left nothing to be desired, and with an earnestness, almost pathetic, which I have rarely seen in an executive communication, the President was left alone to struggle with the situation and the environment in which he found himself; he was left alone to maintain, in the only mode open to him, the parity between the two metals, and to meet the obligation that he owes to the country at large, that there should not be two standards of ultimate payment, one at a premium over the other, that gold coin should not disappear, and that we should not be put upon the basis of silver alone.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. GRAY. I will.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator what, in his judgment, is the premium to obtain gold which the President pays to this syndicate under the contract which has been published?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will pardon me for not going into that now, as it is not pertinent to my line of remark.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon. He was asserting repeatedly that all of this had been done to maintain the parity.

Mr. GRAY. I did assert it, and if the Senator will pardon me, no premium has been paid to obtain gold; just the contrary.

Mr. VEST. I wanted to know whether it was consistent with maintaining the parity to make a contract which implied necessarily a premium on gold?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, just at this stage of the remarks I am making I will simply say that it did not imply, in my opinion, any premium on gold. But what was it, I ask, that the President of the United States was required to do by the duty which pressed upon him with an insistence and with an imminence that he could not disregard? He wanted, as I have said before, to maintain the parity between these two metals. How under heaven could that parity be maintained except by holding himself ready in the Treasury of the United States to make payments in either gold or silver as the demandant might require? Does anyone pretend to say that that parity could be maintained when the Senator from Colorado presented to the Treasury his demand notes and asked for a thousand dollars in gold, if they told him they would pay him a thousand dollars in silver?

Mr. PEPPER. Why could he not do that?

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator believe the parity could be maintained by hoarding the gold and keeping it as if it were a metal that was at a premium and upon which the Government of the United States itself set a premium by withholding it from those who demanded it for the other forms of currency which might be offered in exchange for it?

Mr. STEWART. I will suggest to the Senator that that is the way that France and Germany have maintained the parity for years.

Mr. GRAY. I am talking about the condition in this country, the condition which the President of the United States placed before us in his message. That condition was one, to those who believe that it is absolutely necessary for the soundness of our currency and our financial condition that this parity should be maintained, full of alarm. Gold was being withdrawn from the Treasury at the rate of millions each day, until finally, just before this contract was bruited about in the newspapers, it had risen to a figure as high as seven millions, I think, and over in one day. From December 1 up to the date this contract was made there were about $80,000,000 of gold withdrawn from the Treasury, and of that less than one-half was exported, showing that more than one-half of this gold was withdrawn for the purpose of hoarding by the people of the United States, not by bankers, for the banks showed that they had less gold on the date of this contract than they had at the date I mentioned, the 1st of December, 1894.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, not for the purpose of interrupting him at all?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator lose sight of the fact that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the other day showed that out of the $165,000,000 of gold for which the bonds had been sold $105,000,000 had gone to pay current expenses?

Mr. GRAY. I have not lost sight of that fact, but I find the figures as follows: That between December 1, 1894—and I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the statement—and February 13, 1895, the date of this gold contract, the total amount of the withdrawal of gold was $30,785,000. This is taken from the official figures of the Treasury Department. The export of gold during the same period amounted to only $36,852,389, showing that a good deal more than one-half of the gold withdrawn from the Treasury was withdrawn not for the purposes of export, but was withdrawn by the people of the country, in sums large or small, for the purpose of hoarding, for that gold did not make its appearance in the gold reserves of the banks, the banks showing less gold at the period mentioned than on the 1st day of December, 1894.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, at this particular point I wish to ask the Senator whether there is anything in the law to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from paying the demand notes in silver?

Mr. GRAY. No; I do not know of anything of that kind in the law. I have said so. If I have not said so, I will say so now.

Mr. PEPPER. Then ought not the Secretary of the Treasury to do so, and would not that prevent the exportation of gold?

Mr. GRAY. There is another law, which will perhaps qualify my answer, which obliges the Secretary of the Treasury to preserve the parity between the two metals.

Mr. PEPPER. Does not the Senator believe the Secretary of the Treasury could do so?

Mr. GRAY. I have tried to explain, but perhaps I have not made myself clear to the Senator. To do that it is absolutely necessary that the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain at all times at the Treasury of the United States the absolute exchangeability of silver for gold. If there is any other way of preserving that parity I have not heard it suggested.

Mr. PEPPER. Then, I will suggest it now.

Mr. STEWART. How can you maintain parity by putting a premium on gold?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is "still harping on my daughter." I will come to her directly.

Mr. PEPPER. The demand notes are payable in coin, and they were made payable in silver as well as in gold by the act of 1869. If the Treasury should pay every demand note that is presented in silver, would not that have the effect instantly to restore the parity between gold and silver?

Mr. GRAY. I think not; but I do not want to go into that now, for that brings up a very much larger question upon which the Senator and I radically differ. If the Secretary were to do what the Senator suggests and refuse gold the exchangeability of the two metals would be destroyed and gold would be at a premium.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I desire simply to say that I do not think the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] should go unanswered. I do not understand that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that $105,000,000 of the proceeds of the bonds have gone to the payment of the current expenses of the Government or that any other sum of the proceeds of the bonds has so gone.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to state what the Secretary of the Treasury does say on that subject? That will settle, I think, that proposition.

Mr. GRAY. I have no objection, but I have read from the figures which came from the Treasury Department as to the withdrawal of gold and as to the gold export, and have drawn the, I think, not unreasonable deduction that the difference between the amount of gold withdrawn and the gold export would indicate the amount withdrawn for hoarding, which did not appear in the accounts of the banks.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the question.

Mr. GRAY. That is the question to which I was addressing myself.

Mr. TELLER. Very well, then, I will leave the matter.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, that was the situation. We found for days—five, six, or eight days—before this contract was made the withdrawals of gold had continued each day in an increasing amount until the subtreasurer in New York felt bound to say that he could not hold out more than a day or two longer against the demands that were coming in in increasing amounts at the counter of the subtreasury. So the question was presented to the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury whether they should allow this country between sundown and sunup to relapse to a silver basis, with all the attendant suffering which would come from the readjustment of the business affairs of this country which would be consequent upon such a change, or whether he should exert the power the law gave him to maintain the policy which the law enjoins, and procure the gold which was necessary to maintain the parity between the two metals all over the United States, and maintain the absolute exchangeability of silver and gold and every other form of United States currency. What would you have said of him, sir, if he had been derelict to that high duty? Then perhaps we should have heard from the same sources the animadversions which were flung at his head on Saturday last for rescuing his country and the Government in his charge from a situation such as I have described.

I said this was not an ordinary situation. The Government was not borrowing money to pay debts. It was buying gold on the best terms it could obtain it. It is idle to say that when the question was a question of twenty-four hours, perhaps, the Secretary of the Treasury could advertise for bids throughout the country, as he did on the two former occasions, and precipitate the absolute denudation of the Treasury of gold by that very act, for at once everyone who wanted to buy those bonds would have gone to the Treasury and got what remaining gold was there in order to purchase them; and that foolish operation would have been repeated. So he had to appeal for a large amount of gold at once and in lump; and where could he go except to the bankers of the world, those who had the gold or who could furnish it; and, more than that, endeavor to consummate an arrangement, a plan, by which the exportation of gold and the withdrawal of it from the Treasury might be stopped?

That was done and it could only be done in the way adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States for that purpose. To dribble out bonds for gold in thousand-dollar, ten-thousand-dollar, or one-hundred-thousand-dollar lots would not have met the situation. It was necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to have the gold on the counter of the subtreasury to meet the demands of the next morning. He was in the situation of a cashier of a bank with ample resources and assets which were not available. What he wanted was quick assets, assets to meet the demands that would come with the rising of the morning sun. That he did; and this gold was purchased.

It was stipulated that at least one-half of the gold was to come from across the water, that it was to come from the country and from the places to which we had been exporting our gold, thus establishing a gold credit on the other side of the Atlantic against which exchange might be drawn and stopping the profit on the exportation of gold. That has been a fruitful source, as I understand it, of the withdrawal of gold, there being something like $1,800 profit on every $1,000,000 of gold exported at the then rate of exchange, and the money brokers availed themselves of that very readily, and acted upon it in order to realize that, or even a smaller profit.

Doing that, arranging for a gold credit on the other side of the Atlantic, which had been hitherto the source of trouble in the withdrawal of the gold, arranging that as many of the influential and financially powerful bankers of the country and of the world as possible should be interested in maintaining the situation, the President sends this contract to Congress, and lays before them, as I believe he was in duty bound to lay before them, the fact that if Congress would even at this late day authorize him, as he had asked to be authorized on two different occasions, to issue bonds specifically payable in gold he could save to the people of this country $16,000,000 in the interest that would accrue and be paid during the time these bonds had to run. If it was not his duty to do that thing, I should like to know upon what grounds it is denied that it was his duty.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator allow me another question?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PEPPER. I am exceedingly interested in the line of argument of the Senator, and very much admire his frankness. I wish to ask him this question: Whether or not it is his opinion and that of the Administration that the Treasury of the United States at the time to which the Senator is referring was at the mercy of the gold speculators or the bankers or whatever term the Senator may think proper to use?

Mr. GRAY. I will tell the Senator how I would answer that question. I would not say the Treasury of the United States was at the mercy of the speculators and the bankers—that much belabored and despised class of people—but it was at the mercy of the people of the United States, who, obeying that instinct of ordinary human nature, as soon as the danger signal was observed commenced to withdraw gold in small amounts; and I should like to know whether here in this community, whether, perhaps, perfectly properly, on the floor of this Senate and in the other House there were not patriotic men, as patriotic as any, who, seeing that danger ahead of them, did not seek to put their balances in gold as they could; and not only here, but all over the country and in the State of the Senator himself, good and patriotic people, who, recognizing the situation, sought to do for themselves and those dependent upon them the best they knew how. The Treasury is at the mercy of that class as well as at the mercy of the gold speculators and of the bankers.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, 95 per cent of the people of the United States are opposed to this proceeding, I will say to the Senator; and I will say to him that 95 per cent of the people of Kansas have no gold; they have no disposition to hoard gold; they have no paper for which to demand gold; and, further than that, 95 per cent of the people I have the honor to represent are opposed to this whole proceeding.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not wish to dwell upon that point, but people as good and as patriotic as the Senator, or as I claim to be, all over this country, not capitalists, but men who have been thrifty, men who have had a little ahead for a rainy day—that very class were commencing to take fright and turn their small balances into gold, and as an evidence that that was being done I have in part brought before the Senate figures showing the difference between the total amount of gold withdrawals and the total amount of gold exports for the period I have named and the amount of gold in the banks.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will ask the Senator if he knows of any individual among the people of the United States who has attempted to hoard gold, except Russell Sage, who, I have heard, has attempted it.

Mr. GRAY. I do, of my own knowledge.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then they must have come from Delaware. They do not come from my section of the country.

Mr. GRAY. I have known of my own knowledge of persons who turned their small balances into gold in the last two or three weeks. I have not the acquaintance of Mr. Russell Sage or his kind, and it would not be any pleasure to me if I had.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me—I shall not interrupt him again—I saw a statement made in yesterday morning's paper, I think, which illustrates this point very nicely. A farmer from the State of New York went into the city, called at the subtreasury, and passed in two five-dollar bills, United States greenbacks, and asked to have gold for them. He was answered that he must present his bills in amounts equal to $50, or multiples of $50, for that was the law, before he could have any redemption. That illustrates the futility of the argument that the common people of the country are rushing in to have their greenbacks redeemed in gold. They prefer greenbacks to gold.

Mr. GRAY. It had not gone far enough to reach all of the people of the United States; it had not gone far enough to reach perhaps the Senator from Kansas and myself, but when we come to a condition of that kind financial creeds will vanish into air, and every man will try to do the best he can for himself. We know that it was to avoid that condition of things, that unpatriotic and wretched spectacle, that the President of the United States did what he did.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not wish to intrude, but, with the permission of the Senator from Delaware, I should like to state my impression about the matter of the withdrawal of gold and the demand for gold. I do not think it has reached the common people at all. I think that the banks in the country have been calling upon the bankers in New York City for gold. I know the president of a bank in New York City told me a few days ago that on that day his bank had received fifty calls for gold, varying from five hundred to fifty thousand dollars. I speak of that as a matter of fact.

Mr. GRAY. The reports from the banks do show that. That is all I can say about it. I know nothing about it personally.

That being the situation, the President tells us that after the failure of his appeal to Congress he did the very best thing he could in order to relieve the situation and save the credit of the country and the solvency of the Treasury so far as maintaining the parity between the two metals, gold and silver, was concerned. We have to take him at what he said, or we have to convict him of needlessly and of wantonly, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said, deceiving the country in this crisis of our financial history, going into a dishonorable dicker, whether for his own profit or not the Senator did not say, but at least with indifference and carelessness to the wants of the Treasury and the people of this country. I do not believe that there is a Senator within the sound of my voice who believes it. There is no evidence from which such an inference can be drawn.

Some Senator referred to the market price of bonds upon the day that this "discreditable dicker," as one Senator found it in his heart to call it, was consummated, that United States 4 per cent bonds were selling at 114, I think he said.

Mr. STEWART. At 110½, running for twelve years.

Mr. GRAY. I was going to correct him at the time by saying 110½, but another Senator said 114.

Mr. STEWART. On the same basis they would be worth 110.

Mr. GRAY. I understand that perfectly.

I wish to say, what I think must be patent to everyone, that in the stress in which the Administration found itself it was impossible to go upon the market—I think I have already shown that—with a popular loan, so called, and it had to deal with bankers who understood current values and market values, some of whom, I suppose, had been concerned in the previous purchase of bonds for gold, and they had an experience that the bonds in former issues which were sold, for which they had paid 117, went up in a few days to 119, and then immediately dropped to 113 or 114, a fluctuation of more than 5 per cent, a greater difference than existed between the price which they paid for these last bonds and the market price which they were selling for upon that day. But, with the caution of capital, and seeing this enormous fluctuation, I suppose—and I do not know but it is natural to suppose—they endeavored to protect themselves against it by a sufficient margin, in their opinion, to cover the fluctuation which had actually taken place.

Mr. President, in the New York Tribune of yesterday there is an article which I shall ask the Secretary to read, if there be no objection, which I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts, who spoke on Saturday last, will consider at least without bias in favor of the President in its comments upon this transaction. I find the article republished in the Washington Post of this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

FOREIGN EXCHANGE MARKET—HOW THE SYNDICATE EXPECTS TO KEEP RATES BELOW THE GOLD-EXPORTING POINT.

[From the New York Tribune.]

The work that the Belmont-Morgan syndicate will have to accomplish in order to control the foreign exchange market so that rates will be kept below the gold-exporting point is explained in the following paragraphs, which were obtained from a member of the syndicate and circulated by a financial news agency:

In London no bonds will be given to the syndicate, but scrip will be issued there for the bonds to the extent of $30,000,000. The gold fund for these $30,000,000 is already available, and can be drawn upon for any part of the total sum at pleasure. The syndicate is not compelled to ship to this side more than $5,000,000 per month in gold; consequently, until finally shipped, the proceeds of bonds will be held in London, available to be drawn against should it prove necessary.

This is the lever which is expected to operate upon the exchange market and keep it down to a point which will prevent gold from being shipped from here. This part of the operation is likely to involve a loss of no small proportions to the syndicate, but it evidently will protect the Government. The demand for exchange by the public will be lessened because the buying in advance of requirements for fear the gold reserve will be exhausted will be no longer a factor in the market. Another point to be borne in mind in connection with the exchange market is that the syndicate can, if it so determine, allot more than $30,000,000 of the bonds abroad, and any supply so allotted can be drawn for by bills of exchange.

The profits on the transaction will not be exorbitant. It has been charged in the United States Senate that these bonds were 112 in London. That would mean only about 108 here. Exchange on these bonds is figured at the current rate of 48½. Bringing over the gold makes the rate 483, a loss of ½ cents per pound sterling, or ¼ per cent at the start. What the ultimate profit or loss will be can be nothing more than a matter of conjecture, as in addition to the loss on the importation of gold it is entirely dependent on the working of the international exchange markets. These markets, as already explained, must be controlled so as to prevent a renewal of gold shipments.

No plan that did not provide for getting gold from Europe and that did not also provide means to check shipments of gold to Europe could give the Treasury one dollar of permanent relief. This undertaking to change the whole course of exchange must necessarily be expensive, but the syndicate can do it and the Treasury is accordingly benefited.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President—

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me? It was unanimously agreed that at the conclusion of the routine morning business this morning we should proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Agricultural Department. I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator from Delaware—

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Florida will allow me ten minutes I will conclude. I do not wish to interfere with any order of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I give way for that space of time.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not propose to dwell further upon the details of this transaction. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said to the country, as what he says is always listened to by the country, that the President of the United States has made a wanton attack upon the credit of this Government. I did not understand him to say that he disapproved of the purchase of gold in the financial stress in which the President found the Government, but the complaint is because the President consulted the Congress of the United States and laid before them the facts which came to his knowledge, that if, at this late day even, authority should be given him he could negotiate those bonds, specifically payable in gold, at an annual interest of 3 per cent and save to the Government of the United States in the time the bonds had to run the enormous amount of $16,000,000.

That seems to be the gravamen of the Senator's attack upon the President of the United States, that the credit of the Government was attacked and disparaged in suggesting that gold bonds were more valuable than coin bonds. Is there anyone so fond and foolish as to believe that the President of the United States is the one who suggested that there was that difference in the markets of the world, and that gold was still the desired thing, whether rightly or wrongly, by all who had anything to give for it, whether of service or labor or commodity or credit? He was dealing with a world-wide fact. He did not create it, and because he suggested that our coin bonds were less valuable than our gold bonds, and told the Congress of the United States that armed with this power he could make that saving to the Government, it is called a wanton attack upon the credit of the Government.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts says he will vote for the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], but does he not know that the coin bonds of the United States may be paid either in silver or gold, and that there is nothing—I will not say nothing because it is a great deal—that there is only the good faith of the Administration for the time being to protect the holder of such a bond when it matures, if there should happen to be a difference between gold and silver, one or the other being at a premium, in order that the obligee shall get the most valuable metal?

If it shall happen, as I have no doubt the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] thinks it quite possible it may happen, that in the period of time which the bonds have to run silver becomes the more valuable metal—I think it is possible—would it be consonant with the faith of the Government to deny to the holder of a coin bond the silver payment and put him off with depreciated gold payment? Not at all. I do not suppose there is a Senator within the sound of my voice who would vote for a resolution declaring that our bonds ought to be paid in the less valuable of the two metals in which they are payable. Then why object, and why is it an attack upon the credit of the Government to say that they ought to be paid in the more valuable?

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator from Delaware think it would be bad faith to pay the creditors of the Government according to contract? I think it is bad faith not to do it.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Nevada has put that question a great many times, and he seems to think it is his prize conundrum.

Mr. STEWART. It has not been answered yet.

Mr. GRAY. Perhaps I will answer it like a Yankee by asking another question, which is, whether the Senator from Nevada believes it is good faith to make a coin bond with a reservation that you are going to pay your creditor in the less valuable of the two coins? I want to know if that is the purpose of the Government of the United States. I should like to know if that is the policy which the Senator from Nevada would fix upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Let me answer.

Mr. GRAY. And say to the world that when we make coin bonds we declare not that we will pay them in either coin at the option of the creditor, which, I believe, is the true meaning of the bond contract; but we will pay them at all events in the less valuable of these two coins. There is no alternative. If you do not believe it is the duty of the Government to pay in the more valuable coin, say so and say what you believe, if you believe that the Government should pay them in the less valuable.

Mr. STEWART. Why did the Government make the bonds payable in coin—

Mr. GRAY. Now answer my question.

Mr. STEWART. Hold on; I will answer it. Why did the Government make the bonds payable in coin if it has not the right to pay in either coin? I do believe it is not only morally and legally right, but that it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discharge the contracts of the Government in that way which shall be most advantageous to the Government; and so every other civilized country does. France and Germany do it.

Mr. GRAY. I decline to be interrupted further, because I have only a minute. Then, all I have to say is, that if we write the construction of the Senator from Nevada into our coin bonds we write this, that those bonds are payable in silver, provided silver is at a discount as compared with gold when they mature, and that is all there is in it. If that commends itself to the honesty of the Senator from Nevada, which, as I know, is a dominant quality in him, then I shall be mistaken in the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to put him a very brief question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If, as the Senator now says, the faith of the Government is pledged to pay all coin bonds in the best coin, does he think it decent to put into a contract such a provision as this: I will pay you so much if I keep my faith; I will pay you so much more if I break it?

Mr. GRAY. It is as decent as is the question of the Senator from Massachusetts; it is as decent as is the attack made upon the President of the United States for that very statement by the President of the United States. I have contended—

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware does not answer my question.

Mr. GRAY. I have contended that the President is bound by his duty to lay before Congress the situation, and to tell them, as he has told them, that he has the opportunity and it is within the competence of the Government to negotiate those bonds at 3 per cent if they are made specifically payable in gold. I do not think the attacks upon the credit of the United States come from the President, but I think they come more from those Senators who from their high places here are proclaiming to the world that there is this difference in the Congress of the United States as to what the good faith of the Government requires.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend does not answer my question, if he will permit me. My question is not whether he thinks some attack on the President, which I have made, though I do not recollect any on this subject, be decent or not.

Mr. GRAY. I used the Senator's own word.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. I ask the Senator's attention to the point of the question. If he does not like the word "decent" I will use the word "becoming" or "proper" or "wise." Is it, in his judgment, a proper thing for a representative of the United States, when, as the Senator says, as the Administration believes, the faith of this Government is pledged to pay in the best coin, to contract that "I will pay you so much money if I keep my faith, and so much more if I break it?" That is the question.

Mr. GRAY. I will answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator has a very adroit way of putting a question and answering it to suit his own purpose.

Mr. HOAR. A personal attack on the one who puts the question is not a good way to answer it.

Mr. GRAY. The President of the United States, as I have said more than once, was recognizing the situation. He did not create it. I have said what I believed, in which I think the Senator from Massachusetts agrees with me, that the proper interpretation of the coin bonds is that at the option of the holder they shall be paid in one coin or the other. But can we shut our eyes to the fact that the financial world, that those who have money to invest, whether they belong technically to the financial world or not, are uncertain as to what that contract means, for here is the equally distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] who rises in his place and says a coin bond means that it is the privilege of the Treasury of the United States to pay in silver or gold as it pleases.

Mr. STEWART. I say that now.

Mr. GRAY. Is that to have no effect upon those who have money to invest? Is that belief, shared in by many in this very Chamber, shared in, if we may so believe, by a large number of the House of Representatives, to have no effect upon the minds of the people of the world who are seeking to invest in these bonds? Though they may trust the credit of the Government will be maintained by the Administration, and believe that that is the proper and the honest interpretation of the contract contained in the bonds, yet they will feel that if, as the Senator from Nevada says, it is the law of the contract itself, gold bonds are at least 1 per cent more secure.

The President of the United States puts that situation before us and asks us to vote upon the subject, and we refuse. Neither the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], nor any other Senator in this body has, so far as I know, come to the relief of the President of the United States. We have sat here dumb and unresponsive to his appeals. We threw him upon his own resources and left him alone to fight this battle for the credit and honor of his country as he saw that credit and honor involved; and the people of the United States will not forget that he fought the battle alone and that the Congress of the United States deserted him in his hour of trial.

Mr. President, I am sorry that my time has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. GRAY. One moment. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, an article or a part of an article in the Chronicle, a financial paper which has no politics, I believe, but is merely—

Mr. STEWART. A gold paper.

Mr. GRAY. But is merely a record of the transactions of the money center of New York.

Mr. HOAR. What is the article?

Mr. STEWART. A gold article.

Mr. GRAY. It is an article headed "The financial situation."

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator wishes to put in the RECORD some statistical tables which he has examined, and for which he is responsible, I make no objection; but I certainly can not consent that newspaper articles—

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent to have the article read.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. I rise to morning business.

Mr. GRAY. I resumed the floor and asked to have the article read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. VEST. I rise to morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is under the head of morning business.

Mr. VEST. Are these speeches now being delivered in the order of business as to petitions, resolutions, etc.?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair laid before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which is being discussed.

Mr. SHERMAN. We went through the morning business regularly while the Senator was absent.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that morning business without debate should be transacted.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator to yield to me to present an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield with pleasure.

[Routine morning business was presented by Mr. BUTLER and others, which appears under its appropriate head.]

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a part of the article to which I refer, found in the financial paper called the Chronicle.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I am very sorry indeed to object to any request which the honorable Senator from Delaware makes, but I made up my mind long ago, this not being a new proposition, that I should not give consent to have printed as a part of the proceedings of the Senate newspaper articles in the way of discussion or argument on public questions. We have several times since I have been in the Senate found that such articles contained personal attacks upon Senators and matters which were out of order. I do not suppose of course that that is the case under the care of my honorable friend from Delaware, but I think it is a pernicious practice—

Mr. GRAY. The article is not a very long one.

Mr. HOAR. And I propose to stop it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. CALL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the article in my hand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will suspend. The Senator from Florida rises to a point of order. The Senator from Florida will state his point of order.

Mr. CALL. The point of order is that it was unanimously agreed that at the conclusion of the routine morning business this morning the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department should be taken up and proceeded with. While I have no desire to be discourteous to any Senator, I wish to know whether the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will occupy any considerable time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not. I hope I shall be allowed to proceed, now that we have given way to all morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that this is a part of the morning business.

Mr. CALL. A part of the routine morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A part of the routine morning business.

Mr. GRAY. The article could have been read long ago if the reading had been proceeded with. I ask that it be read now as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated. The Secretary proceeded to read the article.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware whether he proposes to have the entire article read?

Mr. GRAY. No, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Will he indicate what he wishes to have read?

Mr. GRAY. I have marked it with a pencil.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the article, as follows:

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

[The Commercial and Financial Chronicle, New York, February 10, 1866.]

Judging from the listless and in some cases flippant way in which Congress and Senators speak and act with reference to the President's purchase of gold and his requests for aid in facilitating the arrangement he has made, we must conclude that they have very little appreciation of the fact that he has saved the country from a great disaster. As yet even the public has not fully realized that business affairs have, as it were, been lifted out of what was seen to be a most precarious situation, and set within surroundings not only hopeful, but full of promise. The complete change which has occurred in the financial outlook is truly marvelous.

Two weeks ago last Thursday was indeed a black day; the more timid, which is always a large class, had become thoroughly alarmed. In conservative circles, too, it was felt that our currency and all values were in great peril. The rapidity with which the gold proceeds from one fifty-million-dollar bond sale had gone into and out of the Treasury was of itself bewildering and disturbing, for it seemed to indicate that another bond sale to our banks, if it could be carried through, which was doubtful, would be of no service. In this plight the week ending with February 2 opened; the withdrawals of gold for the four days ending with Thursday for export and on private account surpassed any previous experience. Had not a powerful influence been secured in the financial world just at that time capable of arresting this movement abruptly, it is questionable whether the Treasury could have sustained itself another week. We doubt, too, whether any other combination of capital within reach than that which was made and used could have done the work.

As it happened, financial movements Friday afternoon, from an excited, feverish, and highly strained condition, assumed at once a calm, healthful, and normal character. How was that reversal of feeling brought about? There were three conditions which had given rise to the existing nervousness and fear: (1) The state of the foreign exchange market; (2) the withdrawals of gold from the Treasury, and (3) the obvious need for a supply of gold outside of the home visible stock. The reversal in sentiment was consequently produced by a concurrent and complete change in each of these conditions. First came the semi-official announcements of the contract between the Government and the New York and London banking houses for a supply of gold, then followed the drop in foreign exchange and also immediately the cancelling of about all the engagements for export, with a return to the subtreasury of $1,800,000 of the gold just withdrawn. What was left to support a fear or for it to feed upon? Absolutely nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the real question before us is whether it is the public policy of the United States to pay its maturing bonds in gold coin rather than in some other kind of coin which may be a legal tender between individuals. I doubt very much whether it is expedient for us at this time to discuss the question. The time will come when it must be discussed and debated at length, but on a collateral proposition, a resolution offered by a Senator without consultation with any one else, to raise this question now in the closing period of the session seems to be injudicious, to say the least. I think we had better confine ourselves to that business which is urgent and must be disposed of during the present session.

But since the question is up, I wish to show to Senators who are here before me that the United States Government in every loan which it has made, in every bond which it has sold since the act to strengthen the public credit was passed in 1869 has demanded gold coin for bonds sold. The question is whether, in order to make a possible saving on the difference between gold and silver, because there can be only two kinds of coin, we will refuse to pay to the bondholder at the maturity of his bond that kind of money which we demanded of him when the bonds were sold.

Now, when the question is presented in that light it seems to me to be so plain that every honest man must feel that we would not dare in the face of public opinion to undertake to pay bonds which we demanded should be paid for in gold in anything less valuable than the coin which we demanded when we issued our bonds.

That is the simple proposition as it occurs to me. Now, to show Senators that what I say is true I will read the laws under which all the bonds of the United States now outstanding have been sold. I have before me the loan laws since 1869 and all the contracts that have been made between the United States and syndicates abroad and syndicates at home and the terms on which we sold bonds to our own people. You will find in all these propositions to issue our bonds after 1869 the stipulation that they shall be paid for in gold coin. Prior to that time all our bonds were sold for paper money, greenbacks or any other form of money that was a legal tender for the payment of debts; but the act to strengthen the public credit, passed March 18, 1869, changed all that. The words of that act are important to be understood. After that time the Government in all its branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, demanded that the bonds of the United States should be paid for in gold coin by the syndicates abroad and by our people at home, and that has been the custom and the rule and the contract under which these bonds are sold.

The act to strengthen the public credit it is scarcely necessary for me to read, because it has become so familiar in our debates; but I will read it in order to present it with the other laws that I intend to read:

It is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

We promised to pay in coin. What coin was existing in 1869?

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator continue the reading? Will he read a little further?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read what I want at present. I desire here to simply request Senators to allow me to finish my remarks without interruption. I have read the enacting part of the law of 1869. Under the face of that law we are to pay these bonds in coin. What kind of coin? The coin that was in the mind of the lawmakers at that time, in 1869. What was the coin then authorized by law? None but the gold coin of the United States. Silver coin might have been issued, but silver coin was worth more than the gold coin. It has depreciated for reasons that have been given over and over again, and I need not go into that argument. The only coin in the contemplation of any man who voted for that law was the gold coin of the United States.

Now, let us look further at a little later law. Here is the law for the refunding of the public debt, a law which excited no animosity or political division. Under date of July 12, 1870, it provided—

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, in a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $200,000,000, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable semiannually in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States, after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate one thousand million dollars of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable at the pleasure of the United States, after thirty years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

The coin then in circulation, and the only coin in circulation here, was the gold coin of the United States, and not the silver coin. It is true that silver was a standard, but it was worth more than gold. Silver dollars were not coined, but subsidiary silver coins, reduced in value under the act of 1853, were a legal tender for only $5.

Those are the two acts by which the faith of the public credit is pledged. Now, let us see how it has been carried out by Congress and also by the executive authority. I have here the first contract made by Mr. Lot M. Morrill when he was Secretary of the Treasury in a volume which contains full information as to the contracts and conditions upon which all these bonds were issued and sold. What are the stipulations here? Mr. Morrill undertook to sell the 4 per cent bonds in order to pay the bonds that were then maturing.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of that contract, may I inquire?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was August 24, 1876. It was the last year of Grant's Administration. Here is the contract set out in full with Rothschild, Belmont, and others, the same parties who entered into the recent contract. Here it is:

The parties of the second part agree to pay for said 4 per cent bonds par and interest accrued to the date of application for delivery of said bonds in gold coin, matured United States gold-coin coupons, or any of the 6 per cent 5-20 bonds called for redemption, or in United States gold certificates of deposit issued under the act of March 3, 1863.

Therefore we demanded when we sold those bonds gold coin, not coin. That was stated there and published to the world. All the purchasers of such of the three classes of bonds paid for them in gold coin or its equivalent. The bonds on their face were to be payable in coin, principal and interest, and no other coin was contemplated unless it could be supposed that by some hook or crook, by some construction or device or evasion, the bonds might be construed to be payable in something else than the money which we demanded when we issued the bonds. These were the terms of sale for all these bonds amounting in the aggregate to fifteen hundred million of dollars.

A few months after that I was called to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and undertook then to sell the 4 per cent bonds, believing the time had arrived when the credit of the United States would enable it to sell 4 per cent bonds. We entered into a contract for that purpose, and here is the contract similar in general terms to the one made by Mr. Morrill. Here is the contract signed by a great number of persons, Drexel, Morgan & Co., Seligman & Co., August Belmont & Co., the same parties with whom the contract was entered into by Mr. Morrill. Here is the stipulation:

The parties of the second part agree to pay for said 4 per cent bonds par and interest accrued to the date of application for delivery of said bonds in gold coin, matured United States gold coin coupons, or any of the 4 per cent 5-20 bonds called for redemption, or in United States gold certificates of deposit issued under the act of March 3, 1893, with the understanding that payment to the extent of the amount of any call shall be made within the time during which such call shall mature.

This contract covered hundreds of millions of dollars of 4 per cent bonds. The contract made by Mr. Morrill of 4½ per cent bonds covered $200,000,000 of bonds, which have all been redeemed. This contract that I have read last covers the very bonds that are now outstanding, because they extend to a longer period, maturing as late as 1907, and they are the last to be redeemed. In the sale of the very bonds we are now purchasing and paying off we demanded of every person who purchased our bonds to pay for them in gold coin at a time when specie payments were suspended, at a time when we did not pay our members of Congress or for the ordinary debts of the Government any money but United States notes, and when these notes were at a discount of 10 per cent in gold. Yet when the people came to buy these bonds bearing at the then low rate of 4 per cent interest, less than bonds had ever been sold before in our country, we demanded gold coin and received it. We refused to take United States notes in payment of our own bonds. To say that those bonds are now payable in some other coin than gold, because a coin of another metal is now cheaper, or the bullion of that metal is of less value than its old ratio with gold, or because prior to the issue of bonds it was rightfully or wrongfully demonetized by the act of 1873, or because of its increased production, it seems to me is not honest or proper.

Therefore I state as my deliberate judgment that the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States, and the people of the United States will never demand that these bonds will ever be paid in money less valuable than that which was paid for them, principal and interest. From the day they were issued to this hour we have paid gold on the interest of those bonds. We received gold in masses for them. We will pay for them in gold; and when the time comes for their payment there is not a Senator in the sound of my voice but who would feel that we must pay them in as good money at least as we demanded for them at the time of the sale.

I was pleased with an observation made by the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. He and I differ widely upon many questions, but upon that I agree with him that it is not at all probable that when these bonds become due but what they will be paid in the usual way, by exchange of other bonds, by gold coin, or by other money then a legal tender and equal in purchasing power to gold. The equity of these bondholders to demand the same kind of money of equal purchasing power with that they paid is as clear and as plain as the light of day; and when that question is presented in the proper form to the people of the United States you will find that they will resent any dishonor that may be brought upon the national credit by the refusal to pay bonds purchased in gold with money less valuable than the gold coin by which the bond was purchased.

I believe in and hope that we may be able to maintain silver coin at parity with gold, as we have done thus far with the silver dollar; but even if this parity should be maintained silver will be far too bulky to meet such transactions as the payment of the public debt. Its very weight will prevent its use in such transactions. I have a telegram from the Director of the Mint, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 19, 1895.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN:

Avordupois weight of 1,000 coined silver dollars, fifty-eight and nine twenty-nine thousandths pounds. Avordupois weight of $1,000 worth of silver bullion standard at present price (99 cents fine ounce), one hundred twenty-six and nine eighty-four thousandths pounds.

R. E. PRESTON,
Director of the Mint.

Now, Mr. President, there are some other things about this matter. While the refunding of the public debt was going on we came to the resumption of specie payment. Then all money was at par. Then it was the policy of the Government in carrying out the laws for the redemption of the balance of these bonds to sell bonds without the aid of a syndicate, without any assistance whatever from bankers or brokers. While our notes were less valuable than coin it was difficult for us to sell bonds in the market except by the aid of bankers and banking associations; but after we had resumed specie payment then the Treasury Department withdrew all their contracts with bankers and offered the bonds, what were left of them, at par or at a premium in the open market in order to pay bonds as they matured bearing a higher rate of interest. They were sold directly to the people of this country as a popular loan. We sold them to the people directly. When all our notes were at par with gold then it was that we provided that the bonds might be paid for not in gold coin only, but in coin and in any other kind of legal-tender money, all at par with gold coin. But that only applied to the bonds sold after resumption to pay the 5-20 issues of the war of the rebellion. Then, and only then, we used the word "coin" in inviting the purchase of our bonds.

It is true in all our laws running through all our history we usually spoke of coin, not of gold coin or of silver coin, because until 1878 there was practically no silver coin in existence in our country which was a legal tender for debts. In 1878 we had practically reached the specie standard. Then the silver dollars were provided for and they were issued; and they have been maintained at par with gold, and I trust in God ever will be. I would be the last man to ever degrade a dollar that has been coined by the Government of the United States and bears its stamp upon it; and I will hold and maintain the silver to be equal to the gold.

But I would not pay in silver the men who have paid gold. No silver was coined until 1878, when the last contract was made. None had entered into circulation. The Bland-Allison Act had not yet passed into a law. I would not undertake to pay either the people who bought our bonds or the bankers at home or the great capitalists abroad in any money less valuable than that which they paid for the bonds. That is the rule and practice of equity and public faith, which lies at the foundation of this whole argument, and Senators can not avoid it or evade it.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about the various loans. I wish here to comment upon the remark made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. He is defending the President of the United States. Mr. President, it is not the President of the United States who is armed with the money power of this Government. The Senator is not ignorant that the President of the United States has no power whatever over these financial questions. He has no business with them. They are not intrusted to his keeping. The Secretary of the Treasury is the only law officer who is authorized to issue bonds or to exercise the discretionary powers requisite. He is the only one who is authorized to conduct these negotiations. Mr. President, the President has no more right to do it than he has to sit in your seat in the Senate Chamber. It is true—

Mr. GRAY. When I spoke of the President I spoke of the Administration and of the Secretary of the Treasury, whom the President appointed. I was aware that the law referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator spoke of the President, not of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GRAY. The Secretary of the Treasury is the appointee of the President and represents the policy of the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator may have meant to include the Secretary of the Treasury among all the rest of the people around the White House.

Mr. GRAY. Then, of course, the Senator from Ohio will understand that the attack on the President of the United States was very much out of place. It was barking up the wrong tree, so to speak.

Mr. ALDRICH. The President notified us of the contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish here to emphasize it, that the President of the United States from the beginning of the Government almost to this time has never been confided with the duty of the care of the Treasury. Alexander Hamilton is the only man ever spoken of in connection with our early loan law. Even the great name of Washington, which sounds aloud in all parts of the world as the greatest man perhaps of any time, although he was President of the United States, was never connected with the financial controversies between Jefferson and Hamilton. The law that I have here read to you, to strengthen the public credit, or to provide for refunding the public debt, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to do so and so. Therefore the President can in no sense be held responsible for this contract. It is the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury that gives it effect.

I must speak in all candor. I do not care to say it, because I have the highest respect for these two officers. I do not think that they were animated by any but the noblest and best motives in doing what they did. I would not say one word that would impeach their integrity or cast a single cloud upon them. I believe them both to be honorable men in every sense of the word; but I must confess that in my view of the matter they made a very faulty contract for the United States. I see by the quotations made on Saturday last that our 4 per cent bonds, still running for ten years, are worth in the market 111. I find that the 5 per cent bonds, which were sold recently at 117, are still worth a fraction over 115. Now the 4 per cent thirty-year bonds, measured by these two standards, ought not to be less in the market than about 120. Why? The thirty years' duration for a loan is an enormous benefit. It has enormous advantages. Between this and the expiration of the thirty years the time will come when we can, as we have in the past, redeem the bonds at probably one-half the rate that is now paid.

Therefore, to give these bonds to anybody, foreigners or natives, at 104½ it seems to me is an improvident act. I can not understand precisely the logic of my friend from Delaware when he says that the President was under some pressure, under some controlling idea that he must get the gold. He could get the gold at par from London, from Berlin, from France, from any country in the world. The par or value of the franc and the sovereign and all the various gold coins of the world is measured by the number of grains in the coins; not by the stamp that is put upon them, but by the value of the grains of gold.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has had great experience in such matters, and the explanation would be very useful to us. Will the Senator explain how the Treasury of the United States was to get gold except by buying it with the bonds of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. But you buy it at its market value, by its weight and fineness, whether in the form of a pound sterling, worth, say, $4.85, according to the rate of exchange. All other gold coin or bullion is measured in the same way.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator state what he is to buy it with except the bonds of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but that ten-year bond of the United States is worth 111 in gold to-day in the market in this country and in England and the commercial world.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is using as a platform for an attack upon the action of the Secretary of the Treasury the financial platform that has been erected by the Treasury Department itself. The action of the President or of the Secretary of the Treasury in the consummation of this deal for gold would create the conditions of credit that support the bonds, and from that platform so created the Senator seems to be making an attack upon his conduct.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Delaware knows very well that there was no complaint whatever made about the first contract by the President and Secretary of the Treasury in the sale of 5 per cent bonds. He followed the rule and got a full measure of value of the bonds. But when you talk about a thirty-year 4 per cent bond then you are dealing with an article that is valuable in every market in the world. That bond running for thirty years at 4 per cent will be sold in England, I will venture to say, within sixty days of this time—

Mr. GRAY. Yet, as I said when I was on my feet a while ago, there has been shown by the market reports a fluctuation of 5 per cent in the bonds that were issued last November.

Mr. SHERMAN. But here is a fluctuation of 15 per cent, between 104½ and 120. Mr. President, they may have been urged by what they regarded as a necessity, but there is no difficulty in moving the gold of the world here, or enough of it, for a bond bearing 3 per cent and a fraction. A difference in exchange of one-quarter of 1 per cent or one-half of 1 per cent will bring it.

Mr. GRAY. What does the Senator mean by speaking of the difference between 104 and 120? Which bond does he refer to?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bonds running for thirty years, according to the statement made, were sold at 104½.

Mr. GRAY. Well?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are worth in the market, tested by any other security on the price list, 120.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator a moment ago said they were quoted at 111.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is a different bond. The 4 per cent bonds running only ten years are quoted at 111. The 4 per cent bonds running thirty years are worth twice the premium given for the ten-year bonds.

Mr. GRAY. That is the Senator's opinion. Has he any market quotations for those bonds at 120?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there are none in existence.

Mr. GRAY. That is the Senator's speculation, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my honorable friend is too great a man to try, I would say, to dodge the question. Does he not know that a bond running for thirty years bearing 4 per cent is worth greatly more than a bond running ten years bearing the same rate per cent?

Mr. GRAY. I know nothing about such things, and I take the market report; and I asked the Senator if he had a market report to bear out the assertion he made. There is no authority for quoting these bonds at 120.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; because there are no such bonds in existence. These are the first to be issued.

Mr. GRAY. Then the Senator can not tell about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say in issuing this new class and description of bonds the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have measured them by similar stocks in the market, and there is no use to get around this conclusion. I regret to say that I think it is an improvident transaction. It is not going to break up the United States. It is not going to impair our credit or affect seriously our liabilities. I believe it was a sharp bargain pressed by men whose services were not necessary in the negotiation of our loans. My own experience, to which my honorable friend refers, convinces me that no loan ought to be placed in the market of the bonds of the United States except after the option is given to the people of the United States. They will find a mode to get gold here. If, therefore, a reasonable proposition had been made, if either of the three classes of bonds set out in the refunding act and at a certain price had been put upon the market and the people of the United States had been required to pay for them in gold, they would have found the gold easily enough.

We have as smart men in the city of New York as there are in all the world besides. We have still shrewder men in Boston; and your good, pious Quaker men in Philadelphia know how to turn the tables. [Laughter.] Give them a chance by a popular loan. The people would contribute the money in greenbacks, in Treasury notes, or silver certificates; and the men who manage affairs in the great cities (I rely on Chicago to speculate a little on them) could convert the various forms of money into gold. That is my judgment. I may be mistaken. Yet I again say that I have not one word of unkindness to say of either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no desire to excite suspicion, because there could be none excited; but I do think it was a faulty bargain from which we can not recede, which we have to comply with, because undoubtedly the Secretary of the Treasury had the legal right to make this bargain, and if he made a bad bargain we must do as other people do when they themselves or somebody for them has made a bad bargain; we must submit to it and bear it as well as we can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4609) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside informally, without losing its place, and that the Agricultural appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

YELLOWSTONE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. POWER. I ask that a House bill lying on the table be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 6750) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in the county of Dawson, State of Montana, was read twice by its title.

Mr. POWER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. CALL. I can not yield for that purpose.

Mr. POWER. It will take only a moment. I wish to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill already reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, Mr. President, I must object. We must proceed with the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8727) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the following clause as amended, beginning with line 9, on page 22:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $3,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I think that the sum of $15,000 as it stood in the original text ought to be retained. I ask the Senator who has the bill in charge if he is not willing to allow the full sum of $15,000 to be retained? It seems to me that the appropriation of $15,000 as made in the other branch of Congress is the proper one. I think the sum is not too great after the statements made here on Saturday in regard to the importance of the appropriation. The sum of $3,000 is too small for the accomplishment of anything materially advantageous to the people of the United States in this direction. I think the sum of $15,000 is required to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of necessary information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, and I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to state that the Secretary of Agriculture is not particularly interested in this fifteen-thousand-dollar appropriation. There is a sum for the purposes of irrigation under the provisions of the sundry civil bill, and perhaps other bills, to be expended under the direction of the Geological Bureau, and the Secretary of Agriculture prefers that the whole amount shall go to the Geological Survey, if possible, and that it all be expended under one direction. I will say to the Senator from Washington that in case this provision is stricken out we shall get a similar amount on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and have exactly the same experiments along the line of irrigation.

Mr. SQUIRE. I think the point was sufficiently elucidated here on Saturday by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] and others who took part in the discussion that the work of the Bureau of the Geological Survey is not the kind of work which is required in connection with the chemical analysis and examination of soils with reference to the value of irrigation.

Mr. WHITE. And irrigation methods.

Mr. SQUIRE. And irrigation methods. As I am told, and as the Senator from California fully developed on Saturday last, there has been a very large amount of excellent work done already by the Agricultural Department in connection with this matter; that something like 280 plans have been sent out, that 4,000 letters have been written, and that a great deal of good has already been done. It seems too bad to stifle this work just in its inception. Let us also have the appropriation for the Geological Bureau. I am not in favor of reducing that; I am in favor of increasing it; but I think it affords no reason why we should not pass this appropriation because we intend in the civil sundry bill to provide an appropriation for the Geological Bureau. Therefore I ask—

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SQUIRE. With pleasure.

Mr. CALL. I call the attention of the Senate to the agreement that we should proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SQUIRE. I had not intended to speak three minutes.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say to the Senator that this clause was amended on Saturday, on the motion of the Senator from California (Mr. WHITE), to insert "eight thousand" instead of "fifteen thousand dollars;" and the vote now comes upon striking out "eight thousand," or retaining it in the bill.

Mr. SQUIRE. That was with the consent of the Senator in charge of the bill to make the amount $3,000. Rather than not get anything, I would accept that, although I think the full amount of $15,000 should be appropriated.

Mr. CALL. That was the vote of the Senate. The question now is on retaining the "$3,000" or striking it out.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I believe that I am as much interested in the question of irrigation as any Senator on this floor. In fact I have been looking for the past four years in this body for some recognition of the Western States along this line, and in almost every Congress we have been defeated. We have had enough of theory in the past. I believe in a little bit of actual practice with reference to irrigation.

Senators will remember the fact that about four or five years ago a committee was sent all through the Western country to ascertain whether we had a body of artesian water underneath the soil of the Missouri Valley and the different States adjoining. We knew there was water there before the commission approached our State. The whole amount of money was expended, and not a bit of good was accomplished by it. We want to-day some experiments along the line of irrigation, and if the money is divided and part of it put here and part of it there on the various appropriation bills, nothing will be accomplished.

I have learned from the Secretary of Agriculture that his Department does not care particularly to make any experiments or to make any particular investigation in this direction, and that he would prefer that the money should go to the Geological Bureau, where the same kind of information can be collated and given out to the people.

I am in favor, if possible, of putting the appropriations for this purpose in a lump into the hands of some particular official of the Geological Bureau, who will disseminate the information throughout the various Western States, determine upon a plan of action, and, in addition to that, conduct an experimental farm for the benefit of the people who are residing in that region. If that can be done there will be something in the direction of practical value.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to suggest to my friend, the Senator from South Dakota, who has just taken his seat, that the particular matter to which this appropriation is proposed to be devoted is the carrying out of the objects of that particular bureau which attends to the matter of irrigation inquiry. I stated on Saturday in detail the large amount of valuable information that had been disseminated upon this subject, how various plans for the irrigation of farms all over the country, and in large numbers—information which can be found in the RECORD without repeating the remarks I then made—had been absolutely sent out, received, and operated upon. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALINGER] stated a fact which, no doubt, was news to many here, that the State of New Hampshire, by means of the operation of this bureau of irrigation, was absolutely getting a foothold, or perhaps, I might say a water hold, in New England.

I know that the Geological Survey people can render valuable service in their particular line; but, as I stated before, I can not understand that there is necessarily or probably any qualification in that Bureau such as would enable it to send out proper information about the actual carrying on of irrigation. That is essentially a matter pertinent to and connected with the Agricultural Department. You might perhaps expect a member of the Geological Survey to tell you whether the mastodon had pastured upon the petrified forests of Arizona before they had been reduced to that state, but you can not possibly expect such an official to tell how to conduct modern irrigation, cultivate the soil, and produce the manifold and varied crops which that section of country under the influence of irrigation does bring forth.

Hence, I say that so far as that matter is concerned it pertains to the Agricultural Department, and I advise the Senator, who is interested in irrigation matters, as I am interested, not to concur in the elimination of the item, which I think to be essential in this direction, but let us take what we can get as we go along.

Mr. KYLE. I will say that I have no objection whatever to this amount of money being appropriated for the Agricultural Department. I presume that it can be utilized there and used for the purpose intended; but I hope the Senator will give me his support when we come to the other bill in the direction of the practical work of irrigation.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will permit me, he knows I have always given him my support in that direction.

Mr. SQUIRE. I assure the Senator that I shall be very heartily in favor of the appropriation for the Geological Bureau, but I do not think this appropriation ought to be cut out of the pending bill. I think the farmers of the country ought to get what benefits they can out of the bill.

Mr. KYLE. I will agree to the provision under those circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senate that the vote just taken strikes out the entire paragraph as amended, the amendment of the committee being to strike out the clause.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I voted on the supposition that I was voting for the amendment substituting "$3,000" for "$15,000."

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the matter, the amendment which I suggested appropriating "$3,000" instead of "$15,000" for this purpose has been adopted; and therefore the amendment of the committee has been changed to that purport. The vote, as I understood the Chair to put the question, was as to whether the clause as amended should be agreed to. Under the circumstances it is important, at least, to know precisely what we are voting upon. The form of the matter is quite immaterial to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee was to strike out three lines in the bill referring to irrigation investigations. Before the vote was taken on that question an amendment was adopted reducing the amount from "$15,000" to "$3,000." The Chair will again put the question on striking out the clause with the appropriation reduced from "$15,000" to "$3,000."

Mr. GORMAN. I only desire to say a word in regard to this provision. A provision similar to this for a small appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for this purpose got into an appropriation bill three years ago in direct opposition to the system which was being carried on through the Geological Survey. It was understood, and it was agreed, by the Agricultural Department that as there was a gentleman in that Department of great skill who desired to make some investigations for a short time only, an appropriation should be made for one year, and on that condition, and that alone, it was granted.

Then, as a matter of course, the two or three very eminent gentlemen who had been drawing nearly the whole amount for salaries came back and wanted another year to conclude their work, and now the question comes up again. It simply amounts to a proposition to keep these few gentlemen in employment, when they are practically duplicating the work being done by the Geological Survey. The Committee on Appropriations therefore, with these facts within their knowledge and with these statements made over and over again, reported to strike out the entire provision. That is all there is of it.

There is not sufficient money appropriated by the clause to accomplish anything for the benefit of the people of the West. There is no special necessity for it, for the work is going on under the charge of the Geological Survey. Therefore I submit that when the proposition is now made to keep in this bill an appropriation of $3,000 it is simply for the purpose of keeping two or three gentlemen in that Department at work.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I very much hope that the Senate will not strike out this provision, and not only that, but I hope the amount will not be reduced to $3,000. Fifteen thousand dollars is little enough for this purpose, and the bureau connected with the Agricultural Department is doing great and practical work, work which is of value and service to the people of the Western country. If this work is to be turned over to the Geological Survey, my experience teaches me that their efforts will be worthless. They have spent thousands and thousands of dollars in connection with the Geological Survey for topographic work which is absolutely worthless in connection with irrigation.

They have gone over the level prairies of the West, in my own State, for instance, making topographic maps which are of no use under heaven except as an exhibition of their skill in map making. Their lines are so far apart that they are utterly worthless in connection with irrigation, and the money they have expended for topography ought to be diverted for the purposes of irrigation and for practical experiments under the Department of Agriculture. That Department is now teaching our people how to run ditch levels without the aid of an engineer, whilst if they should undertake to follow the lines marked out by the Geological Survey they would find water running uphill. The work of the Geological Survey is absolutely impracticable and absolutely worthless in every respect.

I protest against turning this practical work, work in no way connected with geology, over to the Geological Survey, which was created for another purpose. Let the Geological Survey study geology, if they can accomplish any good in that direction; let them pursue it; but do not turn over the irrigation interests of the West to the impracticable men who manage the Geological Survey.

Mr. GORMAN. I am amazed at the remarks of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]. He has been one of the most active members of the Senate in aiding in the solution of this question.

Congress, at the suggestion of gentlemen representing the semiarid region, at the last session devoted a million acres of land and turned this whole subject over to the States. The Senator knows very well that we are trying to eliminate this expenditure from these appropriation bills, and when the Senators from those States made the request we gave the land so that the States might utilize it. The Senator knows as well as I do—for he has been an active agent as a Senator in securing, in a bill which is to follow this, an appropriation on the line necessary for the reservoir sites to be given to those States—that we have appropriated at his request, and at the request of other Senators in that section of our country, a very large amount of money for the Geological Survey to aid the States—for that is what it means—in developing the proper lines. The Senator knows, or he ought to know, that the irrigation and ditch companies, which are formed as private corporations, have been given public lands for reservoir sites without charge by the Government. All that can be done toward solving this question and to enable the people in that section of the country to manage this matter has been done and is being done by the Government, and I have favored it.

I have been as active as any Senator from the semiarid region in endeavoring to give to the people there all the necessary facilities for irrigation, but here is a proposition which, I repeat, found its way into an appropriation bill because there happened to be one scientific gentleman connected with the Agricultural Department who wanted his compensation and who wanted to continue the corps engaged with him in the work. The appropriation was to be for only one year, but it has been made for two years, and it is now proposed to extend it for three years in the face of all we have done, and done after careful consideration on the request of Senators from the semiarid region.

I say, Mr. President, it is wrong. If we want to enter upon the proper system, it is right to give the land and give the surveys, but it is wrong to force upon us here officers who are useless.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator state the character of work which has been done by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. GORMAN. I understand it amounts to absolutely nothing. One or two or a half dozen gentlemen have gone out, looked over the country, and made a report as to the necessity of irrigation. Nothing has been done, so far as I know, of any substantial importance to the people of the semiarid section of country in the development of that region. The work is absolutely useless. As we have given to the States in that region the land, and as we have made the surveys by the Geological Survey, this is all that Congress can do at present, and certainly this expenditure for officers in Washington is useless.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me, I entirely agree with him that this appropriation ought to be given to the Geological Survey, and not put on this bill; but I want to remind the Senator from Maryland of one or two things in this connection. The gift of lands to the States in the semiarid region counts practically for nothing at this time.

Why is it that millions of dollars are annually paid for the improvement of estuaries and rivers and harbors and creeks and mud ponds in the East and in the South, and that great country, which is as fertile as the valley of the Nile, can not get practically a dollar to develop its resources?

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I can not answer the Senator from Nebraska in the question he has just propounded. Irrigation is a very great question to the West. It is one which affects the States in that section of our common country, where they have but little, if any, rainfall, and which has been adopted after careful deliberation. I served on a committee with my distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who has had great experience in this matter, and with other Senators from the Western States, where the effort has been made to develop this system, and it was after the most careful consideration by those Senators and on suggestions made by the former Superintendent of the Geological Survey and by the Interior Department, that it was determined there was no way by which the great work could be prosecuted except by turning it over to the States, after having made these examinations and surveys, and giving it to them to develop. Under that system, as I understand, private and public companies have been formed. The time will unquestionably come when Congress will have to enter upon the question of aiding in that work. It is not for Nebraska or Nevada or Colorado alone, but it means the development of the Union, and then the question that the Senator asks me will properly come up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am as thoroughly in favor of irrigation as anyone, and of aid being given by the General Government, and it is proper that the General Government should aid in this work. I originally offered the amendment whereby a small appropriation was secured for the purpose of collecting and publishing information in regard to methods of irrigation.

It has not been so successful as I hoped it would be. It was not intended at the time, as I informed the committee, to be a permanent appropriation. It was to go on a year or two until there could be such collections and publications of what is known in regard to irrigation as could be acquired here by a small appropriation of money. The report of the Secretary of Agriculture shows that they have bulletins which contain information as to the experiments made in this country, but largely composed of publications in regard to irrigation in foreign countries. There are many works on the subject. These publications may have accomplished some good, but the Secretary speaks of another subject for which there is an appropriation in another bill, and which I regard as more important. That is not proposed to be done by this appropriation. The Secretary says:

There is much need of an enlargement of the operations of the Weather Bureau so as to include a careful and systematic measurement of the water contained in the snow fall and of the rains upon the summits of the various mountain ranges within the arid regions.

It is from this source that the great bulk of water comes which is used in irrigation in the regions under consideration. At present we know little or nothing upon this important physical question within the arid regions, for the reason that about all the observing stations of the weather service are located in the valleys or else low down on the mountain sides much below the snow fields of their summits.

Mr. PEPPER. From what does the Senator from Nevada read?

Mr. STEWART. I read from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture. Under the head of irrigation he appears to lay special stress upon those measurements and estimates as to the sources of the water supply. There is an appropriation for that purpose in another bill. The Committee on Irrigation, which has been alluded to, published a very large amount of information on the subject as well as a good deal derived from foreign sources. I hardly think it is necessary to keep up these publications or compilations, but if it is necessary and proper it is much more important that the matter provided for in the other bill shall be carried out.

Besides, I should like to see the experiments suggested by the Senator from South Dakota tried. If any money is to be expended, the expenditure of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in a single well in South Dakota might develop and bring into the market a large tract of country as to which private individuals are unwilling to experiment. The Government owns the land, and I think that a very worthy object. There may be other instances of that kind. I hardly think, although I am entirely indifferent about it, that it is necessary to pursue this kind of investigation further.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question, not to protract the debate, but for the sake of actual information.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SQUIRE. Does the Senator think the Geological Bureau in its work will cover all the ground that ought to be covered and as to which this paragraph relates? The provision in the pending bill reads:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation.

The Geological Survey is not expected to do that which relates to agriculture.

Mr. STEWART. I think the publications upon the subject are about enough. We printed a very large amount of matter, foreign correspondence, etc. It will simply be restating substantially what has already been printed. I only say that the money could be more economically used, although I am entirely indifferent about it. If the Senate desire this work to go on I have no objection, although I do not think it is the best way to spend money now.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in addition to what I said Saturday. If this is to be a question of jurisdiction between two bureaus of the Government or between two Departments, I am for the Agricultural Department every time. One point that has not been alluded to by any Senator thus far in the discussion, which in my judgment is very important, is that the farmers of the country for whose benefit, and for whose benefit exclusively, in the first instance, irrigation is desired, look to the head of their Department. We have now a Department of Agriculture, and to that Department the farmers are in the habit of looking. I can remember very well that when Frederick Watts, of Pennsylvania, was chosen as Commissioner of Agriculture (I think he was the first gentleman who occupied that office) the farmers in different parts of the country felt as though they had a friend at headquarters with whom they could correspond upon terms of equality. Now, we have gone so far that we have a Department, the head of which is a Cabinet officer. Agriculture has been raised to that standard. Our farmers now feel at liberty at any time and under all circumstances to correspond freely with the Department of Agriculture.

The matter of irrigation is of special interest to our farmers. The farmers of the West have now begun to correspond with the Department, as to the magnitude of which the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] gave us a statement on Saturday. Since that time I have received some additional information, although I do not happen to have the figures at hand, showing the large volume of correspondence upon this particular subject and the rapidity of its accumulation. Let the Geological Bureau go along with its work, but let the Department of Agriculture be gradually strengthened in this great movement until finally it shall have charge of the practical operations of agriculture by irrigation. The Geological Bureau can go along with their scientific explorations and can be of great assistance, immeasurable assistance, to the Department of Agriculture, but I look for a time when the Department of Agriculture will have developed a wonderfully vast system, and when, through the efforts of the Department in that direction, all that part of the great West known as the semiarid region will be densely populated, and farmers there will be prosperous upon little farms of 10, 15, 20, and 35 acres of land.

Enough has already been shown to demonstrate that a 10-acre tract of that fertile soil when properly irrigated is worth more than a whole quarter section of land on the outside.

I know one case that now comes to my mind where a little farm of 10 acres produced for its owner last year over a thousand dollars clean cash, independently of keeping his family. At the time I saw him he told me that the proceeds of his crop then disposed of amounted to over $900, and that he had from $150 to $300 worth yet to dispose of. It is a great question, and I hope we will not strip the Department of Agriculture of a single dollar that can possibly be used in that direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question before he takes his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PEPPER. I can answer it in another five minutes.

Mr. KYLE. I ask unanimous consent to put a question to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to ask a question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KYLE. I understand the Secretary of Agriculture says he has practically completed the work he has been doing, and that he prefers that it shall be turned over to the Geological Department. Is that true?

Mr. PEPPER. If I may speak without asking unanimous consent, I will say that I do not know whether it is true or not. I think if it were true the Secretary would have told us.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask in this connection what is the character of the work being performed under the former appropriation similar to the one now proposed to be made?

Mr. PEPPER. I am not able to give all of it. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] Saturday gave us some very important information on that line. My information amounts to about this, that under the operation of the appropriation about which the Senator from Maryland spoke the Department has started a system of inquiry in probably one-half of the States of the Union. With so small an appropriation to apply to the entire United States the work must be spread very thinly, and there can be but small parts done here and there. Now, my idea is that, beginning with what we have done, if the Department understands that we want the work continued, it will broaden out naturally and logically, and that as the farmers become better acquainted with it after a while, we will give the Department of Agriculture a great deal more work to do than it is now doing along this line.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, unfortunately several years ago an amendment was slipped into a bill in conference which put the disposition of the public lands in the West in charge of Major Powell, the Director of the Geological Survey. None of the Senators from that region knew of it until the Commissioner of the General Land Office sent out circular instructions that no lands could be entered until they were released on the order of the President of the United States. That incensed the Western Senators against Major Powell and the Geological Survey. Their anger has continued until this time. They have forgotten, apparently, that the Geological Survey and Major Powell were not one and the same. So far as my own State is concerned, the Geological Survey has done most excellent work. Men build ditches under the surveys made by that Bureau. The Survey has an establishment there; it has a force in the field all the time, and there is not a man in Idaho who would not wish to see the appropriation for the Geological Survey increased.

As to the amendment under consideration, I do not think it amounts to anything. The true method of irrigation is first to ascertain the amount of water in the Western country, and what it will do. The present Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has put into a bill an item proposing to appropriate $25,000 to gauge the amount of water in the different States. That, it seems to me, is the true method. We must first ascertain how much water we have, how it can be utilized, and how much land it will irrigate. The amendment in the sundry civil bill is, therefore, a step in the right direction. I am heartily in favor of it, the committee understand it, and I think the Western people generally believe it is the true method. While I have no particular objection to the pending proposition to appropriate $8,000, I should much prefer the appropriation of $25,000 contained in the sundry civil bill, which will establish a precedent on the lines along which we must work in order to develop that part of the country.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am decidedly in favor of the appropriation of all the money that may be necessary to make a thorough irrigation survey of all the arid lands of the country. I think, however, that it is advisable to put this work under the charge of one man. I doubt very much whether it is advisable to make an appropriation for an investigation by the Agricultural Department and then another appropriation for a survey or gauging of waters by the Director of the Geological Bureau. I think the work can be done more efficiently by putting the entire matter under the charge of one man, letting him understand that the responsibility rests with him alone.

I wish to make another observation in reply to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. This country in the last twenty-five years has dumped millions of dollars in the harbors, rivers, lakes, and ponds of this country. Every little obscure creek (in one or two instances I believe where they were not able to find it upon the map of any State) has received a liberal appropriation for the purposes of improvement. Over 750,000,000 acres of the most productive land in this country is prevented from being developed to its fullest extent in consequence of the failure of sufficient rainfall.

The Senator from Maryland says that Congress has dealt very liberally indeed with the semiarid regions. He says, "We have given you millions of acres of this land, and turned it over absolutely to the States." What cheerful news, Mr. President [Mr. FRYE in the chair], would it be to you to be informed that the rivers and harbors of the State of Maine, for instance, had been turned over to the State of Maine and you were at liberty to improve them as you saw fit! What cheerful news it would be to this Eastern country and to the Southern States to say, "Why, gentlemen, Congress has turned the rivers and harbors and ports over to your States and you can improve them to your hearts' content!"

Mr. HAWLEY. I never heard of the proposition, but it might not be a very bad one for us at all if we were at liberty to take the rivers and harbors and sell wharfage and privileges of navigation. The land was given to you to sell.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt the Senator would take them and sell them to good advantage. I am not speaking, however, in a complaining sense of making contributions for the development of rivers and harbors. I believe in that policy. But every time we have asked for a dollar to develop the great Mississippi country we are met with the parsimonious answer that that country has been turned over to us and that we may develop it ourselves.

I was opposed to the passage of what was known as the Carey bill, which passed the Senate but a few months ago, because I believed it was an attempt on the part of the General Government to shirk responsibility and to give it the opportunity to say, "We have turned that country over to you and you are at liberty to develop it." If it is a part of the duty of this country to contribute money for the development of rivers and harbors, it is as much its duty to contribute money to provide for an irrigation of the arid lands of this country. What difference is there between developing the Mississippi River or the Missouri River or any of our other rivers and the appropriation of money for the development of the semiarid regions of this country?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Mr. ALLEN. I move to strike out the word "dollars," in line 12 of the bill.

I think what I have stated is in substance all I desire to say on this matter. I hope the subject will be placed under the charge of either the Secretary of Agriculture or the Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall now have a vote without any further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SQUIRE. Will the Chair please state what the amendment is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is the committee's amendment to strike out the clause as amended making an appropriation for irrigation purposes.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over is the amendment beginning, on page 23, line 3, "Investigation and experiments with grasses," etc.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 2, page 23, strike out:

Investigation and experiments with grasses and forage plants, division of agrostology; field and laboratory investigations relating to the natural history, geographical distribution, and uses of the various grasses and forage plants, and their adaptability to special soils and climates; establishment and maintenance of experimental grass stations; employment of local and special agents and assistants; collection of seeds, roots, and specimens for experimental cultivation and distribution; materials, tools, apparatus, supplies, and labor required in conducting experiments; freight and express charges and traveling expenses; the preparation of drawings and illustrations for special reports, and the preparation of illustrated circulars of information, bulletins, and monographic works on the forage plants and grasses of North America, $15,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will fail. I think there are few paragraphs in the bill, certainly none that I know, opening new lines that are so useful as this may become. We have spent a great deal of money in scientific pursuits and investigations, especially in connection with the Agricultural Department. I think there is no other Government in the world that has so honorably distinguished itself in scientific research for the benefit of the people in general and especially in the agricultural line. But here is a neglected field, one upon which there has been very little energetic, persistent, scientific research or experiment.

You will find in the catalogues of our Government publications some exceedingly interesting literature concerning birds in their relation to agriculture. You will find the whole field of insects, insects useful as well as mischievous, very well covered by very valuable scientific investigations. So with regard to all varieties of fruits. There are illustrated volumes showing careful research and investigation in connection with the very enterprising work of a great many private citizens. So in the matter of flowers. So as to shrubs and trees, in connection with hedges, etc.; and to go into the animal field, a great deal of learning and investigation in the matter of horses and bovine cattle, of the different breeds of sheep, the grasses which furnish them the best of food, the quantity of wool they will bear, etc. Then to pass over into one of the fields of grasses, as they are called, Indian corn, wheat, and oats, which are called grain-bearing grasses, our investigation has traced the grain feature of the product, and that has been very well done indeed. Then, besides, take the field of vegetables—turnips, cabbages, potatoes, and all that great class. To all of that we have given much investigation and experiment which have been of great service to the country.

But, Mr. President, the hay crop of last year, according to the Agricultural Department, was worth $468,000,000. If the cotton crop was 9,000,000 bales—I do not remember how much—at an average, we will say, of 7½ cents a pound, it makes only about $270,000,000. The hay crop was $200,000,000 more than the crop of cotton at 9,000,000 bales for the latter. There has been a great deal of investigation, a great deal of study, a great deal of importing and transplanting of seeds, etc., in connection with the cotton crop. I spoke of $468,000,000 as the value of the hay crop. That makes no estimate whatever of the pasturage consumed by 14,000,000 cattle. There is no country that has the resources we have. The extraordinary sweep and variety of climates and soil are obvious to anyone upon reflection. Any man can see upon reflection that the probabilities are there are various grasses to be found in other countries as well as our own that by improvement in cultivation can be as well brought up as the crab apple was brought up to the splendid eating fruit of nowadays. There are, the botanists tell us, more than 3,500 different kinds of grasses, of which over 700 grow within our territory. That makes no mention of useful forage plants, the clovers and alfalfas, which belong to another family. A note laid before me says:

It will be the function of the new division to instruct and familiarize the people with the habits and uses of these plants, to conduct investigations relative to their natural history and adaptability to different soils and climates, to introduce promising native and foreign kinds into cultivation, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KYLE rose.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I have a minute more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am nearly through. I wanted to give the reasons for my special interest in this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a fascinating question. I was led into listening to it and studying it by the experiments of a citizen of Connecticut who belongs to the honorable class of cranks, who is a crank upon the subject of grasses. He has traveled the United States, he has traveled Europe, he has imported from abroad blocks of turf, not the seed bought at seed stores, but the actual turf itself. He cut blocks of turf of special grasses from the finest lawns in England and elsewhere. He cut them into small pieces and stood them in the ground, 5 or 6 inches apart, in large squares; and the little blocks united their roots and tops and became one fine bed or mat. Now he has a large tract of land devoted to that purpose. His neighbors have helped him, but he himself has become possessed of the idea that this is the greatest field of investigation and improvement in the United States; and he has impressed me with that belief.

I have no doubt the Secretary of Agriculture will take great pleasure in administering and expending this appropriation of $15,000 to best advantage.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I was disposed, on looking over the bill in the first place, to favor this provision for agrostology, but on looking further I am disposed to oppose it. We have already provided in the bill, on page 3, for a division of botany, as follows:

Division of botany: One botanist and curator of the herbarium, $2,500; one assistant botanist, $1,000; one assistant botanist, $1,400; one assistant curator, $1,200; one botanical clerk, $1,000; one botanical clerk, $900; in all, $8,600.

The division of agrostology is a branch of botany. It has heretofore been conducted under the botanical division of the Agricultural Department. I can see no reason whatever for now separating these two very important branches of investigation. If we have special clerks who are doing work along this line why establish a second division and pay additional clerks unless it be for the purpose of providing certain persons with positions in the Agricultural Department?

I understand that they are paying a man for agrostological investigation a salary of $2,500 a year, to do the work which is being done at the present time in the botanical division of the Agricultural Department upon a salary of $1,200. I understand that all the work done by this experimenter in agrostology is to collect the various grasses from different points on the globe and catalogue them scientifically with botanical names and make pictures of them and print them in a book. That is all that is done, I understand. Now, I submit that is nothing more than a botanical analysis of the plants and placing them before us in the form of a herbarium. As I said, that work is being done already by the botanical division of the Agricultural Department. I submit that those clerks, who are already paid liberal salaries, are amply able to make the collections of grasses in any portion of the known globe and ascertain all there is about them, whether they are suited to wet regions or dry regions, whether they are suitable for forage purposes or for medicinal purposes, or what not.

In addition to that we have here on page 8 of the bill an appropriation of $25,000 for "botanical investigations and experiments, division of botany, * * * $25,000," that the same botanical division may investigate plants that are useful in the science of medicine. We have here separate provision made for the investigation of plants useful for the science of medicine and those useful for farmers as forage, called agrostology—the grasses—and then, again, we have a general division of botany which covers the whole field. I do not see any reason for separating these various appropriations. Let us have it all in one division called the botanical division of the Department of Agriculture, and pay no persons exorbitant salaries for collecting that which can be just as well collected and which is at the present time collected by the clerks in the botanical division of that Department.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have not myself had time and opportunity to investigate the question involved in the pending provision, but a gentleman of very high character, a scientist who has given much thought and much investigation to this matter, has furnished me the following memorandum, which I ask to put on record as the view I take, and trust—

Mr. GEORGE. Let it be read.

Mr. HARRIS. That is what I ask be read now, that it may become a part of the record of this transaction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the communication presented by the Senator from Tennessee.

The Secretary read as follows:

(Memorandum with regard to the proposed new division of grasses and forage plants in the Department of Agriculture.)

The Department of Agriculture has always recognized the importance of the investigation of our forage resources. The annual hay crop of the country has an estimated value of $300,000,000, and more than 14,000,000 head of cattle are supported upon our grazing lands. There is no country in the world possessing forage resources of such vast extent, and none where the plants which compose that forage are more various. The maintenance and continued improvement of these resources is of importance to every citizen of the United States, and of direct and most vital importance to every American farmer.

In a vast country like ours much exploratory work yet remains to be done in connection with our native grasses, and by continued investigations it can not be doubted that useful species new to agriculture will from time to time be discovered. They are awaiting our attention, and the intelligent introduction of many of them offers a means of improving our agriculture. In the sandy and arid regions of the West and Southwest are nutritious grasses and other native forage plants whose introduction into culture, if seriously undertaken, could not fail in vastly benefiting those sections. The importation of improved and useful forage plants of other countries, and the testing of their adaptability to our climate and conditions have resulted in much benefit to our agriculture.

The study of grasses for special purposes, as, for example, the binding of drifting sands along our ocean and lake shores, the holding of embankments liable to wash by swift currents or overflows, and the making of fine lawns, materially broadens the interest in grasses, without even considering the more important grain-bearing grasses, like corn, wheat, oats, and rye, or those yielding special products, as sorghum and sugar cane, or the wonderfully useful bamboos of the tropical regions.

The recommendation for the establishment of a division of agrostology for carrying on investigations of grasses and forage plants does not introduce new lines of work into the Department, but is made to effect a better organization of this work and to give to it that recognition which its great importance unquestionably deserves. The establishment of such a division will demonstrate to the citizens of this and other countries that our Government fully recognizes the primary importance of the grasses in the rural economy of the nation. The immense value which this work has for the farmers of the United States and the varied and special lines of inquiry which the work necessitates, as well as its broad application to every part of our country, is the justification for this recommendation.

There are over 3,500 different kinds of grasses, of which over 700 grow within our territory. There are, besides, many useful plants—not grasses—such as the clovers and alfalfa. It will be the function of the new division to instruct and familiarize the people with the habits and uses of these plants, to conduct investigations relative to their natural history and adaptability to different soils and climates, to introduce promising native and foreign kinds into cultivation, to identify all grasses and forage plants sent in for identification, and reply to all correspondence relative to these plants. During the past season more than 1,000 specimens, coming from all parts of the country, have been identified, and a great number of inquiries of a practical sort have been answered.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of the committee will not prevail. I think that this paragraph, the appropriation for this division, is the most important item in the bill. I know of nothing in the bill that I should not prefer to have stricken out rather than it. The investigation of grasses with reference to the capability of their improvement and their economic value is a matter to which attention has been only recently turned. One needs only to state that the grass crop of the country is the foundation of the life of all the animals of the country to show how important it is. What farmers have been doing in past years is simply to run out the grasses which they have; no attention has been paid to the development and cultivation of grasses; and I am glad to see that the Agricultural Department is turning its attention to this subject, the most important subject within its purview. I hope the clause will not be stricken out.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I entertain the same view of this question which the Senator from Connecticut and several other Senators have taken. I wish to add in reference to it only one suggestion, not so much with reference to the value of the subject of the investigation in regard to grasses to the agricultural interests of the country as that it seems to be to my mind a fair and just consideration of the head of that Department to permit him to arrange his divisions and conduct his work as seems best to him for the management of that work and the accomplishment of the ends prescribed to him. It is the ordinary usage in respect to the different Departments of the Government that the divisions and sections are arranged by the head of the Department. While it is true that they sometimes take a certain form of law in the appropriation, and in a very few instances it is true that there are specific laws for the establishment of divisions, generally it is a matter subject to the government of the head of the Department; and that ought to be the case.

In the particular matter under consideration the Secretary of Agriculture very much desires that this mode of conducting the investigation already entered upon and much pursued shall be permitted. The other House has agreed to it. There is no other provision in the bill for this investigation if this clause be stricken out.

Mr. KYLE. There is the botanical division.

Mr. VILAS. The botanical division appropriation does not contain any special provision for investigation in regard to grasses and plants of that description. It is only a general appropriation for the maintenance of the botanical division.

Mr. PLATT. And that is limited to investigations relating to medicinal and other economic plants.

Mr. VILAS. Precisely. Here is but a very moderate appropriation asked for these two special divisions, which, as the Senator from Connecticut well said, are of more importance to the interests of husbandry in this country than almost any other feature in the bill. Seventy million tons of hay are produced in this country, the report of the Secretary of Agriculture states; 50,000,000 acres of land are devoted to it, and that but a small portion of what could be profitably employed; while there are known in the world as many as 3,000 different kinds of grasses of which we use but half a dozen. It is a subject of the very greatest consequence to the agricultural interests, as I conceive.

Let me add, Mr. President, that I supposed there was to be no occasion for debate on this subject; that the sentiment which has been so generally expressed by different Senators had been recognized by the committee and that we might expect the committee to yield to it.

Mr. KYLE. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me before he sits down—

Mr. CALL. In view of the expression of Senators on this subject I feel justified on the part of the committee in receding from its amendment.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. PLATT. Then let us vote.

Mr. SQUIRE. Then let us vote. I am very much in favor of the retention of this paragraph in the bill.

Mr. KYLE. My objection was that we spend now in the neighborhood of eight or nine thousand dollars a year—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair). Does the Chair understand the Senator from Florida in charge of the bill to recede from the committee amendment?

Mr. CALL. I suppose it would be better to allow a vote to be taken on the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the Senator in charge is willing that the amendment of the committee shall be disagreed to.

Mr. CALL. I am.

Mr. BUTLER. Then we will vote.

Mr. SQUIRE. Then we will vote "no."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to make one further suggestion in connection with this paragraph before it is disposed of and in favor of it, even though the Senator in charge of the bill does consent that the amendment shall be stricken out. I wish to call the attention of the Department of Agriculture to the fact that over a vast region of this country east of the Rocky Mountains, where there is a soil as fertile as there is in the world, the rainfall averages only 15 inches per year, and in that part of the country vegetation grows rank and plentiful, but that which grows is worthless, such as sagebrush and Russian thistle.

I hope this investigation will result in the discovery of some plant that will take the place of this useless vegetation and that will be of use and profit to man. It seems to me that in the line of this investigation, no matter how much it costs, even an appropriation of fifty times the amount carried by the bill could be profitably expended if one grass can be obtained of utility to man that will flourish as those worthless plants flourish in that dry, arid region.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee which was passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out from line 18, on page 23, to line 4, on page 24, inclusive, in the following words:

Investigations in relation to agricultural soils, division of agricultural soils; investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life; for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils, in the field and laboratory; the location of stations, and the rent of a building, not to exceed $1,000 per annum, for office and laboratory purposes; the employment of local and special agents and other labor required in conducting experiments; the preparation of drawings and illustrations; for materials, tools, instruments, apparatus, and supplies, and for traveling expenses, freight and express charges, $15,000.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I have a few brief words to say on this amendment of the committee.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that on the part of the committee—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SQUIRE. I do.

Mr. CALL. I beg to make a statement in regard to this amendment. In view of the very general expression of opinion on the part of the Senate I will not insist upon the amendment of the committee, but will allow it to be submitted to a vote.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I simply wish to say in regard to this paragraph, as I would have said in regard to the one preceding it, that I am in favor of extending the power of the Agricultural Department; I am in favor of magnifying that great office, and giving to it every added facility and all the money needful to assist the farmers of this country. I believe, with the Senator from Nebraska, that there has been too little done in the way of expenditure in behalf of the great farming interests of the United States as compared with other great interests.

I would not underrate the value of the improvements for rivers and harbors. I believe they are for the benefit of all the people, and not for the benefit of the particular localities where they happen to be established by nature, assisted by art and science through human agencies; but I believe that there has relatively more money been expended in connection with the subject of transportation than there has with reference to the development of our soil. Therefore, as I said before, I am in favor of every one of these appropriations. I do not see one in the bill which has been adopted by the House of Representatives that we should omit, and I am very glad that the Senator from Florida, in charge of the bill, has agreed to permit this amendment to be voted down, so as to retain the paragraph as it is in the bill.

Mr. President, I believe that is the only thing we shall have any contention about, and we can get through with this bill immediately. I ask the Senate to vote the whole amount without any reduction as to the appropriation as embraced in the paragraph.

Mr. ALLEN. I have here a paper, which has been very carefully prepared by the Agricultural Department, which I ask to have read in this connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read in the time of the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary read as follows:

DIVISION OF AGRICULTURAL SOILS.

The division of agricultural soils is to be established to study the conditions which give each of the principal soil formations of the United States their peculiar agricultural value, adapting some to grasses, others to wheat, truck, tobacco, and fruit. It has been shown that the peculiar adaptation of these soils is not due so much to their chemical composition as it is to the texture of the soils and their conditions of moisture and temperature. Soils adapted to early truck and small fruits, for example, are sandy, open, and warm, allowing the rain to pass through them very readily and maintaining only a small amount of moisture. This dry condition gives them their peculiar value for forcing vegetables to an early maturity.

The tobacco soils of Pennsylvania owe their peculiar value to their close texture and to the fact that they maintain generally an abundance of moisture for the crop. This produces a large, heavy type of wrapper which competes with the Cuban tobacco. The tobacco of the Connecticut Valley, on the other hand, is grown on a very light textured sandy loam, and the soil being much drier the crop is much lighter in color and finer in texture. It competes with the Sumatra wrappers.

The work of the division is to be confined principally to the study of the texture of the soils adapted to these different interests. The methods for the study of the physical conditions of the soil are not very well known, and the agricultural colleges and experiment stations are not equipped for this work, nor do they understand the methods. It would be one of the purposes of the division to work out these methods and encourage an extensive study of the soils of the country by the experiment stations and colleges.

These problems, however, could never be successfully and thoroughly worked out by local institutions, for it must be based, in the first place, not upon State boundaries, but upon geological formations which may cover a number of States and may be found in widely separated parts of the country. Samples from the same formation and same class of agricultural soils must be collected from all over the country where they occur, and carefully examined and compared. For example, to study tobacco soils of Pennsylvania we must study the texture of the tobacco soils of the Connecticut Valley, which produces a different type of tobacco, the bright tobacco soils of Virginia and North Carolina, as well as the conditions in the dark shipping tobacco region of Kentucky and Tennessee, and of the barley district in Ohio. It is only by this extensive study of different soils which are known to give different products that we may hope to understand the conditions in any one soil and how these conditions should be changed to improve the quality or increase the yield of the crop. No State experiment station or agricultural college could attempt investigations on such an extensive scale as is necessary to work out the fundamental principles of crop production. The Department of Agriculture can send to Cuba or Sumatra for samples of their soils to compare with the soils of Pennsylvania and the Connecticut Valley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.
✓ The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This ends the committee amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, who owns the swamp lands which are named on the twentieth page, in lines 21 and 23, in the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys, in California, on which the Government proposes to expend $10,000, or a portion of it? This is a new departure, so far as I know, on the part of the Government of the United States to expend money in improving the private lands of individuals, and I think it might be a curious fact to find out where the ownership of those lands resides.

Mr. CALL. I will answer the question of the Senator. The committee made no inquiry as to the ownership of these lands, nor did they conceive it was at all important to do so any more than to inquire who owns the sugar cane lands or the sugar maple tree lands. They regarded the development of this soil into the production of sugar cane and rice as a national measure, and as that was insisted upon by the Senators from California and was in the bill as it came from the other House it has been retained by the Senate committee. That is the whole explanation.

It is understood that there is a large and valuable section of country in California which may by a little experiment be found to be adapted to the growth of sugar cane. This very small appropriation was made in conformity with others, and is of exactly the same character as other appropriations in the bill for the purpose of developing the productions of different parts of the country.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are millions of acres of land in the United States which are now useless for any purpose of cultivation, swamp and other lands, belonging to private individuals, which I have no doubt they would be very glad to have the Government spend money in improving. The Senator from Florida says the Committee on Appropriations have made no inquiry into this matter, and do not know to whom the lands belong. A proposition to expend Government money upon a Government reservation or upon Government lands might perhaps be tolerable, but for the Government of the United States to enter upon the work of improving the private lands of individuals in any part of the country is a very questionable one, according to my notion. As the Senator in charge of the bill seems to have no knowledge of the subject, except a very glimmering idea that the Senators from California desire to have the item retained in the bill, I move to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 18, after the word "necessary," it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That so much thereof as may be necessary may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be expended in experiments in sugar-cane and rice production on reclaimed swamp lands in some suitable place in the San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley, California, to be used by the Department free of charge.

Mr. CALL. That is a provision which came from the House of Representatives and which was insisted upon at least by one of the Senators from California. I do not know about the other.

With reference to the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island, all the property in the United States is owned by its citizens, the people of the United States. There is nothing in his argument. He is getting to be more of a State rights man than is to be found anywhere when he is not in favor of expending money for any purpose except the improvement of the Government property. The Government is only the people. There are no distinctions in that respect. I do not see that it is at all necessary to know who owns the land. We are not improving the land. That would be a mere incident if it should occur. We are endeavoring to introduce and bring into use a great production, precisely as we are doing in the tariff, to introduce an industry in manufacture in the State of Rhode Island, and the Senator can not distinguish by the one-thousandth part of a hair's breadth a difference in principle between this appropriation for the development of a great agricultural industry in California and a manufacturing industry in Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CALL. I will.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Florida agrees with his party generally that it is not constitutional to impose duties upon articles of importation on the ground that it may prove a benefit to some private individual.

Mr. CALL. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Here is a proposition to expend the public funds upon the lands of a private individual, to improve those lands, and possibly to improve other lands around the same property.

Mr. CALL. I never heard such a proposition as that stated by the Senator from Rhode Island from any political party. If there be such ideas entertained I do not entertain them.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have thought the Senator from Florida was a little uncertain in his Democracy at times, but I did not expect from him so open a repudiation of the Chicago platform as he is now expounding for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I do not think I am as unsettled in my Democracy as the Senator from Rhode Island is unsettled in his Republicanism.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Florida will allow me a word, I wish to entreat the Senator from Florida not to delay the passage of this appropriation bill by entering into a discussion either of the tariff or of State rights.

Mr. CALL. I have not done so.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it seems to me, while these two subjects may have some possible relation to this clause, yet we have not the time, if we are to get this bill through to-day, to go into them. I am a faithful coadjutor at this time of the Senator from Florida in his efforts to get this bill through, as I have been on other occasions, and shall continue to be in the future, so long as the Senator occupies a seat on this floor.

The pending question is a simpler matter than that of State rights, and I think the question which the Senator from Rhode Island has put ought to be answered either by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] or by his colleague [Mr. WHITE]; that is the question whether we are to try sugar culture and rice culture upon reclaimed swamp lands belonging to private individuals in the State of California. It may be that we ought to do it. I do not want to get in the way of any experimentation which the Department of Agriculture may desire to carry forward, but I should like to know first whether the Secretary of Agriculture wants to make these experiments.

I do wish to know what he has said about it; and then I should like to know whose lands are to be improved by these experiments. If either of the Senators from California can explain what is intended, or if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who I see has succeeded in getting the little word "rice" inserted in the body of this amendment, can satisfy me that this money ought to be expended in this manner, and upon these reclaimed swamp lands belonging to somebody in California, I shall make no opposition to the amendment, and I presume the Senator from Rhode Island will not; but we are entitled to some explanation of an important item of this kind, and certainly we ought to have it without having inflicted upon us a discussion of either State rights or the tariff question upon an agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER obtained the floor.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President—

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has appealed to me, Mr. President, but I yield the floor to the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I fully sympathize with the zeal of my friend from New Hampshire and my friend from Rhode Island in desiring to urge the passage of this bill, and I have voted with them generally, at least on all propositions which tended to expedite its passage.

My friend from Rhode Island seems to have discovered in the bill a provision which he believes is calculated to improve the private land of some large landowner in the State of California. I desire to state for his information that a year ago, under the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, there was placed in the agricultural appropriation bill $10,000 for experimental stations. Rhode Island would probably have had a part of that appropriation if the Senator had been as zealous in looking after that State's interests as Senators from other States have been in looking to the interests of their people, who do not, however, get more than their quota of the appropriation; but be that as it may, California made application to the Secretary of Agriculture, and represented to him that there were in our State many thousand square miles of land known as swamp and overflowed lands, and the alluvial lands of the valleys, which were peculiarly adapted for the culture and raising of rice and sugar cane.

We have not, however, understood the cultivation of the sugar cane sufficiently to experiment with it or demonstrate to the farmer that it could be successfully cultivated. But representations were made to the Secretary of Agriculture, and he appointed the assistant secretary of agriculture of our State University to select lands in a proper locality where experimental stations might be established, and that money has been expended in experimenting in the cultivation of sugar cane and the raising of rice. The State secretary of agriculture entered upon his mission and many propositions were made to him throughout the great San Joaquin Valley, the Sacramento Valley, the Santa Clara Valley, the Napa Valley, and other great valleys of our State. After thoroughly reconnoitering the State and examining the various propositions he selected a place on the San Joaquin River, where 40 acres of land were tendered to the Government free of charge. A station was there established and the planting of sugar cane and rice commenced. Ten acres, I am informed, were placed under cultivation. The experiment has been most successful. The cost to the Government has been a mere nominal sum. This land is at the disposition of the Secretary of Agriculture for as long a time as he desires it without cost.

This provision is not for the purpose of improving the land of any owner, but it is to demonstrate to the people of California that we have a large area of land, more than 3,000,000 acres, which is suitable for the cultivation of sugar cane and the raising of rice. Therefore I can not see any objection whatever to this provision. I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw his amendment, or, at least, if he does not, that it will be voted down.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I have finally succeeded in getting an explanation from the Senator from California in regard to this provision. It seems that the owners of certain lands in California, through their representatives, have succeeded in inducing the Government to expend some money already upon those private lands. As I understand the Senator from California, there are in California millions of acres of swamp lands, which are now useless for any purpose, that certain of the owners of those lands have transferred to the Government, very liberally, the right to expend a large sum of money upon them to improve them, and they have consented also, very liberally, not to charge the Government anything for the right to expend this money in improving those lands, they being valueless otherwise. If that plan is to be adopted in regard to the constituents of the Senator from California, I hope he will not consider me selfish if I should try to have the same rule applied to people who own land in other parts of the United States.

In the State of Louisiana there are millions of acres of swamp land; in the State of Florida there are thousands upon thousands of square miles of swamp lands upon which the Government might experiment for the benefit of their owners. If a man in my State desires to have useless land which he owns improved or experimented upon to find out whether it has value for certain purposes, I am sure he would never think of coming to the Government of the United States and seriously asking it to make an appropriation for that purpose.

I am a great believer in the national authority of the United States and in its power to do almost anything which a great nation might do, but it does seem to me we are going altogether too far in legislation of this kind in providing that the Government shall expend its money in improving the lands of private individuals, whether they are citizens of the State of California or of any other State in the Union.

I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to strike out the proviso on page 20 is eminently a proper one. There is but $10,000, all told, proposed to be appropriated in the item under discussion for the purposes of experiment in the manufacture of sugar. This proviso, which appears to have been put on an appropriation bill in the House of Representatives for the first time a year ago, would authorize every dollar of the $10,000 to be expended upon one particular 40 acres of ground in the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys, in the State of California.

I am informed by the Secretary of Agriculture that hardly anything, perhaps not exceeding $100, has been expended in doing any work or acquiring any property for the purpose of experimenting in the cultivation of sugar and rice in the San Joaquin Valley.

I am further informed by the Secretary of Agriculture that most of the appropriation which was made in the last Agricultural appropriation act was not used by him at all for any experimental purpose in the production of sugar and rice, but that nearly all of it was covered back into the Treasury of the United States.

If it would be a proper thing to appropriate $10,000 for the purpose of experimenting in sugar and rice, why should not the place at which those experiments are to be made be left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture? There should not be anything invidious placed in the law itself, as it is sought to be placed here now, which would confine him in his operations to one particular 10 or 40 acre tract of ground in the San Joaquin Valley.

I doubt very much whether this appropriation will subserve any good purpose in any event; but, if it does, it should be general in its nature, at least to the extent of permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to select the particular spot where these experiments shall be made.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island ought to prevail.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island to modify his amendment by striking out the words, in lines 21, 22, and 23, "some suitable place in the San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley, California, to be used by the Department free of charge."

That is an extraordinary provision in a law fixing the very point at which experiments shall be made, and the bill ought to be corrected to that extent at all events. Afterwards the question of whether we shall appropriate $10,000 for experiments will come up.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be very glad to have the language so modified as to read "at some place in the United States."

Mr. GORMAN. I believe it will be first in order to strike out the words after the word "lands," in line 21, down to and including the word "charge," in line 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the text proposed to be stricken out by striking out after the word "lands," in line 21, on page 20, the following:

In some suitable place in the San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley, California, to be used by the Department free of charge.

Mr. GORMAN. The fact is, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], that the lands have been selected; but as I propose to amend the clause, the appropriation of $10,000 for these experiments will be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture wherever he thinks proper. That is the usual way of making appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. At some suitable place in the United States?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this discussion is entirely without any foundation either in the history of appropriation bills, as stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], or in the reason and propriety of the case; and there is no foundation for it in the appropriations which have been made for the geological surveys. We do declare, and we have for years declared, that certain portions of these appropriations shall be expended beyond the Mississippi River and in particular sections. What objection can anyone have to saying that Congress shall leave to the Secretary of Agriculture the discretion that certain portions of this money shall be expended in this or that or the other section of the country so that it may be equally, fairly, and impartially done?

The Senator from Maryland undertakes to say here—and that is the only logical proposition he makes—that the discretion of the Secretary is greater than the discretion of Congress. That is no foundation for a motion on this subject. I am indifferent about the words of the bill, but why should not California have, by direction of Congress, an equal advantage in this appropriation with any other State? Will the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Rhode Island tell me that? Why is it any different from an appropriation in the river and harbor bill that, for instance, the harbor of Baltimore shall be improved? If so, what is the difference?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator asks me a question. I think he misapprehends my motive in this matter. I want to put all the States on an equality, and give to the Secretary of Agriculture $10,000 to make these experiments, without locating the place where it shall be expended.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Maryland now says that he wants to leave to the discretion of the Secretary of War whether he will improve Baltimore Harbor or not, and he will not have Congress say that the Secretary shall apply the money there. That is the Senator's proposition now. There is no foundation for it.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] undertakes to ask about who owns this land. It is not material who owns it. This provision says the land shall be used by the Government free of charge, no matter who owns it. What more do you want?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I appreciate the kind words said by my friend from Florida in favor of this appropriation, and yet I am disposed to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland and leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. The only reason why I hesitate to do so is because of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. He is the only one who made such a—

Mr. BLANCHARD. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from Louisiana offered no amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will refer to the speech of the Senator from Louisiana, made in favor of striking out the provision. This Government, if my memory serves me correctly, has appropriated more than a half million dollars for experiments in raising sugar in Louisiana. If I had had a vote at that time I should have voted for it, but the moment I brought forth incidentally the inference that California would be a rival of Louisiana in raising cane sugar, as she is to-day in beet sugar, he could see no merit in the proposition to appropriate a few thousand dollars for experiments in the great valleys of the State of California. Yet, he forgets how much this Government has done, and wisely done in my opinion, in making experiments in Louisiana.

I have confidence, however, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I am willing, in the absence of my colleague [Mr. WHITE], to take the responsibility of accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to strike out of the clause that part relating specifically to experiments in San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley. That will satisfy my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], being of an amiable disposition, always acquiesces when we appeal to him as I now do. Therefore I hope it will be made unanimous, that the appropriation will stand, and I will take the chances of the Golden State getting her pro rata of the appropriation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from California when and where the Government has expended $500,000 in Louisiana for experiments in the manufacture of sugar under the item now under discussion?

Mr. PERKINS. Perhaps that was a lapsus linguae. I meant the whole country; but Louisiana means the whole country practically as to sugar raising, and now she wants a bounty from all of us.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not know of any money that has been expended in Louisiana—

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will read the report he will find it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. One moment. I do not know of any money which has been expended in Louisiana in the manufacture of sugar under the particular item of appropriation in the bill that is under discussion. If the Senator will turn to the next page, under the head of "Agricultural experiment stations," which is an entirely different matter, where experimental stations are established by the Government in the line of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1887, to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States, then I will say that in the agricultural experiment stations provided for by that clause money has been expended in Louisiana as it has been expended in the State of California. But I know of not a single dollar that has been expended in Louisiana for experiments in the manufacture of sugar under the particular item of appropriation in the bill that is now under discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know that I correctly understood the Senator from Florida in the statement he has just made. I understood him to say that I had no right to offer the amendment; that it was not in order, and that I had no right to discuss it.

Mr. CALL. I never said anything about order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I so understood the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. That is the province of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know upon what ground the Senator based his suggestion.

Mr. CALL. I should not invade the province of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly understood the Senator in that way. I shall be glad if the Senator from Florida will agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, and also to the suggestion to amend the proposition in line 20, by striking out the word "and," and after the word "rice" inserting "or other agricultural products," so that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have a right to expend any portion of the money in experiments in the production of sugar cane, rice, or other agricultural products produced on reclaimed swamp land. That will enlarge the field of the inquiry. I do not know any reason why it should be confined to sugar cane and rice. If we are going into the business of experimenting on swamp lands why not see what other agricultural products can be produced on those lands?

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to extending it if the Senator has a particular objection to rice.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to rice. I think we had better enlarge the provision and take in all such products.

Mr. CALL. I have not the slightest objection. I will merely say in explanation that these experiments have been conducted for three years. The late Senator from Kansas, Mr. Plumb, was a great advocate of this experimentation not only as to sugar cane and the extraction of the juice by cheaper processes, but in respect to sorghum and beet sugar. It was chiefly through his efforts that for many years an appropriation for this purpose has been made in the agricultural appropriation acts. A large sum of money, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], has been expended in these experiments not only as to sugar cane, but also as to beets, and the endeavor has been to distribute equally its benefits upon the different sections of the country. I have no objection to accepting the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to insert, in line 20, before the words "sugar cane," the words "the production of."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I accepted it. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], I understand, is willing that the words as to the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys shall be stricken out.

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CALL. I accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to amend the proviso so as to read:

Provided, That so much thereof as may be necessary may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be expended in experiments in the production of sugar cane, rice, or other agricultural products on reclaimed swamp lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am opposed to the amendment. The Senator from Rhode Island is too diffusive in his motions. The Senator started out to oppose the expenditure of money for sugar cane and rice experimentation upon private lands. He seems now to have abandoned his objection to expending money on private lands, and seek to have experimentation in regard to sugar culture and rice culture and the culture of all other agricultural products anywhere in the United States where the Secretary of Agriculture chooses to go.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator from New Hampshire not to misunderstand my position. I have not abandoned the motion to strike out the proviso. I have submitted an amendment merely to perfect the text preparatory to striking it all out.

Mr. CHANDLER. I still say the Senator covers too much ground. I am opposed to diverting this small sum of money from experimentation in the culture of sugar cane to making it embrace other agricultural products.

I think it was a mistake for the rice producers to procure the insertion of the one word "rice." The Secretary of Agriculture with this limited appropriation for all the purposes specified in the first portion of the paragraph can not do much. He certainly can not occupy any considerable number of acres with the cultivation of swamp land in California, and if he is to be commanded by Congress to experiment upon swamp lands anywhere or everywhere in the United States where he may find them, for the purpose of determining what agricultural products those lands are fitted to produce, the experiment will be so broad that a very much larger sum of money ought to be given to it. I think the experimentation in sugar culture, which has been going on for many years, and for which in the pending bill a very moderate amount of money is proposed to be appropriated, ought to be allowed to go on, and that the experimentation ought not to be made as extensive as it is now proposed. Therefore I hope the amendment will be voted down.

If after that it is satisfactory to the Senator from California not to require the Secretary of Agriculture to expend the money upon swamp lands in the San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley, then I trust an amendment to that effect may be made. The amount of money to be expended is, after all, small, and the number of acres that are to be improved by the expenditure of Government money is not large, and I certainly have no sympathy whatever with the objection made to this appropriation by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. When Louisiana has had so many millions of dollars of Government money expended in developing the production of sugar cane in that State it is, I think, ungenerous in the Senator from Louisiana to oppose the expenditure of this small sum of money in the State of California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be considered as agreed to. The question is on the motion to strike out the proviso as amended.

Mr. McPHERSON. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, if I understand it aright, will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make these experiments upon a scale as large as he pleases.

Mr. ALDRICH. Subject to the limitation of $10,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out the proviso as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. If the committee amendments have been disposed of, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to make an inquiry for information. I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] was agreed to, striking out in line 21, page 20, after the word "place" the words "in the San Joaquin or Sacramento Valley, California, to be used by the Department."

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that my amendment was adopted.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland was adopted; and then the amendment was agreed to, which was to strike out the whole proviso.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Does this come out of my time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will see that the rights of the Senator from Massachusetts are protected. The Senator from Massachusetts submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after line 10, page 9:

For the extermination of the gypsy moth, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, $50,000.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offer that amendment in the hope of getting aid from the United States in the extermination of one of the worst pests that has ever been imported into this country. The first specimens were brought from Europe about twenty-five years ago by an entomologist. They were, unfortunately, allowed to escape, and in the course of ten or fifteen years in the neighborhood of Boston, particularly in the neighboring town of Medford, they assumed great proportions. Their ravages became so extensive that it was necessary for the State to take action, and during the last five years the State of Massachusetts has spent nearly $400,000 for the extermination of this moth. It comes, as I said, from Europe. It is extremely prolific. I think the female lays something like thirteen or fourteen hundred eggs, and even after exposure to a New England winter 70 per cent of the eggs will survive. In warm climates, such as those of our Southern States, they would produce two broods. They destroy practically every growing thing, particularly trees. They destroy all the products of the truck farm. They destroy corn. They will destroy grass if there is nothing better for them to take.

By the expenditure of the large sum of money which I have mentioned by the State of Massachusetts the area of the ravages of this moth have been checked; that is, it has not been allowed to spread beyond the original area, and it is undoubtedly much reduced. They are easily carried. They are, as I have said, extremely prolific, and in a warm climate would be particularly so. The extent of the damage which this insect does can only be judged by those who have seen it. They are more destructive, I think, than almost any known insect. They are known in Europe. They have been there for many years, especially in the Mediterranean states, and large sums of money have been expended there by the Government in restricting the area and endeavoring to exterminate the moth.

The State of Massachusetts has spent the amount I have stated, and will spend a great deal more in this work, but the State feels that it is entitled to some assistance from the National Government, because it is doing what is really a national work, as the extension of the moth to the other States would be of great damage. It is for this reason that I have offered the amendment. I feel about it as I felt about the Russian thistle, that it is something to spread from one State to another, inflicting the greatest possible damage, and that it is therefore something for the extermination of which the assistance of the United States should be given.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was under a misapprehension—

Mr. CALL. If I may be allowed to say a word, I shall be very willing to vote any reasonable sum for the purpose the Senator mentions, but I do not think there has been any estimate or recommendation on the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland, if I may have the assent of the Senate, although his motion to lay on the table is of course not debatable—

Mr. GORMAN. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Maryland whether he will not consent as a representative of the committee to have this appropriation or some portion of it at least put at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. Our people without any exception (I do not think they are apt to be panic-stricken) regard this as a great menace to the agriculture of this country. As my colleague has stated, our Commonwealth alone has spent $400,000 to stop this pest. I do not think there is another State in the Union that would come to the Senate with that statement made by its Senators without receiving aid. If the State of Florida were to come here and say that thing, or the State of Colorado or any of the new States of the West would come and say they had expended $400,000 to check a pest which was menacing the whole country and should ask moderate aid from the National Government, it would be given. I suppose my colleague would accept as an amendment the addition of the words "to be expended if in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture it shall seem desirable," or some phrase of that sort.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland to let it go.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I ask the two Senators from Massachusetts if they are satisfied that the amount named is not unnecessarily large for the work?

Mr. HALE. Make it $45,000.

Mr. HOAR. Make it a smaller sum, say $40,000.

Mr. CALL. I will submit the question to the Senate. As far as I am concerned, I attach great importance to the statement of the Senators from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I am willing it shall have the responsibility behind it of the Secretary of Agriculture, who comes from a distant part of the Union, as to the propriety of the expenditure, not making it imperative. With that modification I hope my friend from Maryland will see his way clear to waive all objection to the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. It is difficult to refuse any request the Senator from Massachusetts makes about a business matter of this sort; but the Senator is perfectly well aware that the present very distinguished Secretary of Agriculture and his corps of officials have been exceedingly active in looking up every subject, it seems to me, on the face of the earth that troubles the soil, or the air, or individuals, or cattle. The Secretary has recommended appropriations, and the appropriations are found all through the bill, always to be disbursed, however, with a liberal appropriation for officers. In this case it seems the Secretary has not made an estimate. I do not know whether the matter was brought to his attention, whether it is widespread or troublesome, and he overlooked it, or whether it is only beginning. The point I make is that it is the beginning of a system of making appropriations for stamping out a pest, and it ought to be done only on the recommendation of that Department, and the reasons given by him for it.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. The State of Massachusetts undertook alone to deal with this pest and has spent $375,000 and will probably spend this year twice as much as is asked for here. The matter was not presented officially to the attention of the Secretary of Agriculture. The entomologist of the Department was brought up there to examine the work being done and testified before the Committee on Agriculture in regard to it. The State has no desire to ask for money if it is not thought on due investigation by the Secretary of Agriculture that we are engaged in what amounts to a national work, of which we are willing to do and glad to do the larger part. But if we are engaged in a national work in preventing the spread of a pest which will be of the utmost damage to all the States and particularly to the South, where the climate is milder, we feel that it is not unfair that we should have in that work some national assistance.

I am perfectly willing to modify the amendment as suggested by my colleague and make the sum smaller, and leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to make any expenditure at all; but I should like to have the amendment in that form go in the bill, so that the matter may come before the Secretary of Agriculture, and if he is not convinced that the work which is being done there is a national work of interest to all the States, we will not ask him to spend a dollar of the appropriation. It is only on that ground that I desire to put it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I attended last summer a meeting of the American Forestry Association, where there was a full exhibition made of the ravages of this gypsy moth in the State of Massachusetts. It would have been better perhaps for Massachusetts to have let the moths get out into warmer regions. Perhaps it would have been better to have allowed them to go down South where there is a milder climate, and where they would grow, leaving the bleak hills of New England for the sunny South. Massachusetts did not do that. She spent this money lavishly, as she always expends money lavishly for any good work of this kind, and she has limited the area of this terrible destroyer.

I do not believe the Senator from Maryland wants to see those moths in Maryland. I do not believe any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber wants to see a devastating swarm of gypsy moths take possession of the foliage of the magnificent forests of the South. When this amount of money has been expended as it has been by Massachusetts, and she wants some recognition of what she has done by the National Government, I think that Senators ought to be willing to allow the amendment to be adopted.

If the Secretary of Agriculture, who is giving close attention to his business, finds, after the amendment has gone with the bill into conference, that he does not want it, that it is not necessary, that it is not useful, that it is not wise, that it is not within the scope of other similar work of the Department, then there will be no objection to having the amendment stricken out in conference. But I do ask Senators, particularly those from other States and other sections, to let us have, amidst the lavish appropriations of this bill in behalf of other sections of the country, this little recognition and a little help for the work that Massachusetts is doing to suppress a pest that will devastate the forests of the whole country if it is not checked.

Mr. GORMAN. After the statement of the Senators from Massachusetts, as I see they have modified the amendment so as to provide that the money shall be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, I shall not press the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment may be read as modified.

Mr. BATE. I should like to say that the pending amendment has been before the Agricultural Committee. I believe it was stated that it had not been before any committee. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture. There was no final action, however, taken upon it, but there was decided opposition shown in the committee to it. It was referred to a subcommittee, from which, I think, there was no report. I understand it has not been recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture; that no estimate was made for it; and no committee has recommended it. It comes in here de novo. I think it ought not to be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 10, page 9, insert:

For the extermination of the gypsy moth, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, if in his judgment it may be necessary and expedient, $40,000.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, not as being in charge of this bill, but as a member of the committee, I think a statement of fact such as has been made by the two Senators from Massachusetts gives them a right to recognition upon the bill. Therefore I make no objection to the amendment as a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BATE. Let us have the yeas and nays on agreeing to it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I do not see him in his seat, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. BLACKBURN (when Mr. LINDSAY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LINDSAY] has been necessarily called from the Chamber. I do not know whether he has a pair; but he asked me to announce that his absence from the Chamber was owing to unavoidable conditions which he could not control. He left just now.

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. INBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. FRITCHARD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and vote "nay."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who is absent on official business. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. PETTIGREW (when Mr. WASHBURN's name was called). I was requested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] to state that he is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If the Senator from Minnesota were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after line 15, page 6:

For the purpose of purchasing and distributing seeds and seed grains among the drought-stricken inhabitants of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules as he may prescribe, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; the same to be immediately available.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to state briefly that there is very great necessity for the adoption of this amendment. It is not proper for me to stand here and describe as fully as I could the distress that prevails in this country in consequence of the recent drought. It is sufficient to say that the drought extended over a portion of my own State, a portion of the Dakotas, Kansas, and Colorado. It was not a single drought; it was a drought that occurred two different years; so that a great many thousands of people will be unable to plant their farms to raise crops of any consequence unless some aid is extended to them. I do not propose at this time to go into the ramifications of this distress. It is sufficient to state that the distress is greater than the press has at any time given the world to understand.

Since I introduced this amendment I have been in daily receipt of letters from all sections of the drought-stricken country, not from the State of Nebraska alone, but from Kansas, from a portion of Colorado, and a portion of South Dakota. It is something exceptional in the history of our State that we should have two complete failures of crops, one succeeding the other. The rule has been in the State of Nebraska, and especially in the eastern portion of the State, that we have had crops and good crops. In fact the rule has been in the western portion of the State that we have had good crops. But it must be remembered by Senators that the sections of country to which I refer as having suffered most in consequence of the droughts are sections of the country where the people are living upon homesteads and where they are undergoing all of the privations and hardships incident to pioneer life. If some measures are not adopted to relieve them the coming summer, in the nature of furnishing them seed to some extent, there will be a great many hundreds of thousands of acres of land that can not be planted, and a great many thousands of people will be out of employment.

This is a delicate matter for me to talk about. Upon one hand, are real estate men who are claiming that the credit of the transmississippi is affected by talking about these matters, which I do not believe. Upon the other hand, is the cry of distress of thousands and tens of thousands of people; and when I am put to the test of choosing between following the wishes of a few real estate men and answering the cries of distress and hunger of my fellow-citizens I prefer to take the latter course.

There are precedents for this, and I shall detain the Senate but a moment. April 11, 1892, Congress appropriated money for a similar purpose in an act which will be found in chapter 77 of the Statutes at Large, volume 23, as follows:

That the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purchase and distribution of seeds, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to the people in localities overflowed, who are made destitute by the present overflow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

There are other precedents which I have examined, but the reference to which I have mislaid. Congress and the Government have on more than one occasion made contributions to people of different sections of the country who have been overtaken with some great misfortune. It has been a common thing to contribute support to fever-stricken districts, to districts which have been overflowed. Where some great misfortune has befallen the people of any particular section of the country, which becomes a national calamity, it has been the custom of the Government to extend relief to them.

I do not ask that this relief be given absolutely to these people. I ask that the sum be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture, so that in his wisdom he may, if he sees fit, invest this sum of money in seed and seed grains for the purpose of relieving these people to some extent.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Nebraska would localize the effect of his proposed amendment, if he can do so, for this reason: While we have not been so fortunate in our whole State of Kansas as they have been in some other parts of the country, yet our difficulties lie chiefly in the western portion of the State. The legislature has already taken action looking toward the supply of those people with seeds of all varieties. A hundred thousand dollars has been appropriated. I think the act took effect two weeks ago, perhaps a little longer, and the machinery of purchase and distribution is now all in effective working order. The people who need supplies of this kind are being furnished right along from day to day, the seeds being distributed through the commissioners of the various counties.

As to the smaller seeds, the garden seeds, flower seeds, and things of that kind such as are usually distributed by the National Department of Agriculture, I have borrowed and begged—I shall not say “stolen,” for I have not had an opportunity to do that [laughter]—but I have borrowed and in other ways have received from fellow-Senators, whose more fortunate neighbors do not need them so much as ours, a large amount of seed, and up to this time I have kept pace with the demand for that class of seed.

At any rate, whether or not the Senator from Nebraska sees proper to limit the area of his amendment, I wish him and the Senate to understand that, so far as Kansas is concerned, our people have taken care of themselves.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what the Senator from Kansas means by limiting the area of my amendment. I do know, and I am not going to cavil with him, that there is distress in Kansas. I have no sympathy with this false sentiment which witnesses distress in this country and yet is afraid to speak of it for fear somebody may be offended. There is distress in western Kansas, and there is widespread distress.

Mr. PEPPER. I know it, but we are taking care of it. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. ALLEN. There is distress in western Nebraska, and it is widespread; there is distress in eastern Colorado, and that is widespread, and there is considerable distress in North Dakota, all occasioned by drought.

It is true, Mr. President, in my State the legislature has enacted a law authorizing counties to bond themselves to provide aid in the line of furnishing seed to those who have suffered in consequence of the drought and who are unable to procure seed for themselves; but I want to say that that is inadequate to the demand. I have sent into my State not only my own quota of seed allowed by the Department of Agriculture, but I procured seed so far as I have been able from others; but it is a mere bagatelle. I say that in the State of Kansas, in the State of Nebraska, and in the State of Colorado there will be thousands of acres of land unplanted this year unless some measure of relief be brought to the people of those sections of the Union. I do not say that it is absolutely necessary for Congress to do it, but it must be done by somebody and in some manner. We voted into this bill twenty minutes ago $40,000 to extinguish the gypsy moth, which I suppose some one brought into this country to experiment with, and it got loose from him and is now afflicting the State of Massachusetts. Here are thousands and tens of thousands of people who are at the mercy of their fellow citizens in some form; they must have relief at the hands of the people of this country, through Congress or otherwise, or many of them will be deprived of planting their lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to modify his amendment by inserting the words “in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.”

Mr. ALLEN. I accede to that suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. As modified the amendment will read as follows:

For the purpose of purchasing and distributing seeds and seed grains among the drought-stricken inhabitants of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, and in his discretion and under such rules as he may prescribe, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be made immediately available.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to make an inquiry there as to whether the terms used would be such as to include those portions of the United States which have been fire swept? The forest fires have destroyed many thousand acres.

Mr. ALLEN. No; it does not cover that case, but I am perfectly willing that those words should come in, so that the amendment will read “drought-stricken or fire-stricken.”

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes; let it read that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. PASCO. How has the amendment been modified?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

For the purpose of purchasing and distributing seeds and seed grains among the drought or fire-stricken inhabitants of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, etc.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, if we are going to enter upon this line of expenditure, it seems to me that we ought also to include the frost-stricken inhabitants of the extreme South. The people of my State have been deprived of the means of planting their ground. Their truck patches have been ruined by the phenomenal cold of the past season, and if we are going to enter upon this line of expenditure, I suggest that the amendment be further modified by including those sufferers also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is that the motion of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PASCO. I make that motion.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the motion?

Mr. PASCO. That the frost-stricken inhabitants of the extreme South be included.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that amendment.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska why not?

Mr. ALLEN. Simply for this reason: No distress has been brought to the people of Florida or any other section in consequence of frost. There is no loss of crops.

Mr. PASCO. I will say that there was a total loss of the crop in my State on account of the extremely cold weather we have had there during the last few weeks.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator whether there is any loss of crop which would require seed such as are described in this appropriation bill?

Mr. PASCO. Exactly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator explain how that is? I understood it was the orange trees which were destroyed.

Mr. PASCO. The entire crop there has been destroyed during the severe weather of the past few weeks, which very largely increases the demand for the classes of seed which are being distributed by the Agricultural Department, and it is difficult to fill the applications made from the regular supply on account of this very fact.

I had not expected to ask for this assistance, but if those who have suffered from too much fire and too much dry weather in other parts of the country are to be supplied there is no reason why the people of Florida should not also be included.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Florida will not insist upon his motion. I can not believe that it is sincere upon his part. It seems to me the only purpose is to load this amendment down and destroy it.

There has been no loss of crop in the State of Florida so far as past years are concerned. The crop there was perfect last year, and it was perfect the year before. There is every reasonable probability that it will not be this year; but I want to say to the Senator from Florida that if he knew the absolute squalor and want and suffering there is in the section of country of which I am speaking he would not treat this subject with levity.

Mr. President, there is no section of this Union to-day where an honest, hard-working, Christian people are suffering to the extent the people of the Western country are suffering in consequence of the successive loss of their crops. I speak of this with diffidence; I do not want to talk about it; it is a thing which ought not to be talked about any more than is absolutely necessary; and it is a question which ought not to be treated with levity. I state to you that these people are appealing to me and they are appealing to other Senators from certain sections of that country for relief, and they appeal in a manner which leaves no mistake of the fact that they are suffering.

I do hope the Senator from Florida will withhold his spirit of levity and not undertake to load this measure with an amendment which he must know is designed for the destruction of the measure in so far as it makes this appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER. Are we proceeding under the five-minute rule, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall have to insist hereafter that that rule be observed. Several Senators have spoken twice.

Mr. CALL. I think I ought to say a word about this amendment, as it applies to the State of Florida. I do not see the ground of the opposition of the Senator from Nebraska to this amendment. I am willing to vote whatever sum of money may be reasonably ascertained to be necessary for the relief of the people of Nebraska or of any other State, and to supply them with seeds where they can not otherwise obtain them.

In reference to Florida there is no question that there has been there a vast destruction of the property of these people, and there are large numbers of them who will be so impoverished that they will not be able to purchase the necessary seeds to grow the products necessary to support their families. There is a great vegetable section of country there, and now that their oranges are nearly all ruined the people will be compelled to plant largely of the ordinary crops of vegetables of the country, simply to sustain life. It is necessary that there should be an appropriation to furnish these people with seeds, as the destruction there has been great, from all the information which I can get, and a large part of their crop of the present year, upon which they were dependent for the purchase of supplies, has been absolutely destroyed.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Florida that the cases are not parallel in any degree. They have, to be sure, lost their crop in Florida this present season, or a portion of it; but only a portion of it, I believe. During past years in South Dakota and in Nebraska we have lost both our wheat crop and our corn crop, and during those years we never thought of coming to Congress for help; but now for a period of four or five years we have had successive crop failures, until now the people have mortgaged about all they are able to mortgage in order to get the grain this year, and it is impossible for them to obtain credit in any way.

I have had letters which are heartrending from the people of my own State, as well as from those of other States in that drought-stricken region, appealing to the Secretary of Agriculture through me to obtain even a small pittance of garden seed, saying they have not even 10 cents with which to purchase garden seed this spring. It is something which ought not to be talked about in this Chamber, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has said.

I do not think there is a parallel between this case and the case suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] of those who have been burned out by the forest fires. That is a thing which occurs only once perhaps in a lifetime. The drought in the Missouri Valley region has continued now, as I said, for a period of five years. In one place in South Dakota I know it has continued for seven years, and in no year during that time have they had to exceed a half crop, and for the past two years the crop has been an absolute failure, the people having been able to raise only two or three bushels of wheat to the acre, and get for it perhaps 35 or 40 cents a bushel. So they are out really as regards money when the crop is harvested and gets to market.

I hope the amendment will not be modified in the manner suggested.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to say a word. I have no wish to prolong this discussion nor to protract the time to be consumed by this bill; I wanted it disposed of on Saturday last; but we are now on an important matter, which ought to be attended to promptly, and then we should finish the bill.

I am not in favor of discriminating against any part of the United States with reference to the appropriations for the relief of the people who have had their garden seed and their field seed destroyed by fire. I believe it is right to assist the people of Nebraska and Kansas and all those Western States, but I also believe it is proper and right to assist the people of the State of Washington who have had their field seed destroyed by fire. I am also in favor of assisting the people of Florida, if they need it.

I believe in being generous and just at the same time. If we have the right, as the stewards of the people, to assist the poor and afflicted in any section with reference to the future prosperity of our country and the maintenance of life, we ought to be fair to all portions, and I am willing to vote relief, if it is needed, in behalf of the people of Florida, just as readily as I am willing to vote it for the people of Nebraska or the people of the State of Washington. I think we ought to be prompt about it, and if the amount is not sufficient let it be increased. But let us be fair toward all parts of the Union.

Mr. ALLEN. I am assured by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] that he is sincere in his motion, and that there is really suffering in the State of Florida which deserves the notice of Congress. I am, therefore, perfectly willing that the amendment offered by that Senator shall be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "fire" in the amendment, it is proposed to insert the word "frost;" so as to read:

Among the drought, fire, or frost stricken inhabitants of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. VILAS. I inquire if the amendment was moved by the direction of any special or standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to say that the amendment was introduced and sent to the Committee on Agriculture, and it was brought back here a day or two days ago reported adversely. That was precisely the condition of the gypsy moth amendment, which was placed upon the bill a few minutes ago.

Mr. VILAS. Neither amendment was in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not make the point of order on this amendment, but let it go through.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I was simply going to add that a few years ago when a similar bill was sent to the President of the United States it was vetoed on the ground that it was beyond the rightful power of Congress to so use the public money of the United States. I do not think any appropriation bill ought to be sent to him carrying an appropriation which he holds to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. If it were to be sent to him it should be sent in a special bill by itself, and I feel that it is my duty to call attention to the fact that under the rules this amendment is not in order.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator allow me a question there?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. KYLE. We have had during past years hundreds and hundreds of such amendments placed upon appropriation bills, and they have become part of the statutes of the United States. We have in the sundry civil bill, which will be reported to the Senate inside of another day, about two hundred such amendments, probably affecting the statutes of the United States, which might be considered general legislation. Why, then, raise the point of order upon this amendment as being in violation of the rules of the Senate? They are all in violation of the rules of the Senate, and we know it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the point of order will not be made against the amendment. Of course it is true that the President vetoed a similar bill, but Presidents change their minds sometimes as time progresses, and the President may change his mind upon this subject. Moreover, if the President has objections to a bill of this nature he may not care to veto it.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish my sentence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the point of order of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I inquire if the point of order is debatable? A point of order has been made against the amendment, I understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was appealing to the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. That does not answer my question. I simply rose to inquire whether debate was in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will listen to the suggestion of the Senator on that subject.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely desire to inquire whether the point of order is debatable? If not, I object to debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This point of order seems to be debatable. [Laughter.] It appears to be debated.

Mr. BUTLER. It is evidently being debated, Mr. President.

Mr. CHANDLER. I only wish to say that I was far from intending to wound the sensibilities of the Senator—

Mr. TELLER. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not understand that it is in order for any Senator to recite the fact that the President of the United States has vetoed a bill of a similar character, and suggest that a bill may be vetoed. I understand that it is entirely out of order to make any reference to what the Executive may do with a bill of this kind or any other.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is not a matter for the determination of the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. VILAS. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will give me leave to say that in what I said there is no intimation whatever of what the President would do in regard to this or any other bill. I simply recited a fact as the reason why I felt bound to raise the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. Nevertheless the Senator from Wisconsin is out of order. By the well-established rules which govern this body no such references are in order, and by the rules which govern the Parliament of Great Britain no member of that Parliament would think of rising and suggesting either that the Executive of that country was friendly or hostile to a bill. It is a thing that is never heard of, and it is entirely out of order to make even a suggestion of the kind made by the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not care about it in this instance, but it certainly is a very bad practice into which the Senate is falling. I have heard a similar statement on a number of occasions lately. There should be no allusion here as to what the President may or may not do as to any bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Colorado insists upon his point of order, I agree to it. I think myself that it either is or it should be out of order to suggest the possibility of a Presidential veto of any measure of legislation that is before Congress. I will not proceed to reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Wisconsin if it is understood that his suggestion was out of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have a vote, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] makes the point of order against the amendment as amended. The Chair submits the question to the Senate for its determination.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I think this proposed legislation is very bad. The legislature of the State of Nebraska is now in session. That State is without indebtedness, or at least with a very small indebtedness.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit, Mr. President, that the question is not debatable.

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, yes; when the question of order is submitted to the Senate it is debatable.

Mr. GORMAN. The question has been submitted to the Senate, which makes it debatable.

Mr. CAREY. I have no doubt that the people of Nebraska will take care of the sufferers in that State.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to state that I am not talking about the people of Nebraska particularly, and I have not talked about them. I am talking about a section of country which embraces a large portion of four or five different States.

Mr. CAREY. Will the Senator answer a question, if he can?

Mr. ALLEN. I will answer all the questions the Senator may choose to put to me.

Mr. CAREY. Has any State, South, West, or East, memorialized Congress to make an appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; nor has the State of Nebraska; but I have been the recipient of hundreds of letters not only from the western part of my own State, but from other States, and a portion of the Senator's State included, upon this very subject.

Mr. CAREY. I will state to the Senator that I have not received an intimation from any source, beyond the usual requests for seeds, and I wish to state to him further that the largest crops were produced in the Rocky Mountain region last year that were ever known in the history of that country.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not doubt that at all, but there are various portions of the Senator's State where they did not have crops.

Mr. CAREY. In the shape in which the amendment stands at present if it passes and becomes a part of the laws of the United States it will establish a precedent, and every time there is a severe frost or a drought or a fire or a flood in any section of the country the people will come to Congress and appeal for a special appropriation. I believe appropriations of this kind do great injury to the West. I do not believe they do any possible good. I believe the Dakota legislature and the legislature of Nebraska will take care of the people of those States so far as seed is concerned, if they actually need it.

It has been stated by one of the Senators from the State of Kansas that Kansas has already made provision to furnish her people with seeds. They had great crops in the State of California, the State of Oregon, and the State of Washington, but just as soon as an amendment of this kind is introduced you can see how anxious Senators from other States are to get in on the amendment. I have no doubt the Senators from Florida would like the United States to go down into Florida and replant the orange trees and the banana trees which have been destroyed. I do not believe there is any necessity for the proposed legislation. I believe it does great damage to the West.

Nebraska is one of the wealthiest as well as one of the greatest States in the American Union. It happened to have a drought, it is true. I do not suppose the farmers of Nebraska raised on an average over 25 per cent of the crop they should have raised. But suppose there is a drought in some other State next year, will it be right for that State to come here and ask Congress to dispense charity? I do not understand there is any rule against talking about what has been done heretofore by Congress. The President of the United States sent a message to Congress in 1887, which I hold in my hand, vetoing a measure appropriating $10,000 for the State of Texas. I believe the principles enunciated in that veto message are right. Congress did not see fit to overrule the President. They undoubtedly took the same view of the subject that he did, because they upheld him in the veto.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit me a moment? I wish to call his attention to a law which was not vetoed. On page 44 of the Statutes at Large, volume 22, there will be found the act of April 11, 1882, which reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purchase and distribution of seeds, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to the people in localities overflooded, who are made destitute by the present overflow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

There is an act that met the express approval of the Executive.

Mr. CAREY. There was another Executive in 1882. Mr. Arthur was President. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but I should like to have an extract from the veto message of President Cleveland read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated. The Secretary read as follows:

The friendliness and charity of our countrymen can always be relied upon to relieve their fellow-citizens in misfortune. This has been repeatedly and quite lately demonstrated. Federal aid in such cases encourages the expectation of paternal care on the part of the Government and weakens the sturdiness of our national character, while it prevents the indulgence among our people of that kindly sentiment and conduct which strengthens the bonds of a common brotherhood.

It is within my personal knowledge that individual aid has to some extent already been extended to the sufferers mentioned in this bill. The failure of the proposed appropriation of $10,000 additional to meet their remaining wants will not necessarily result in continued distress if the emergency is fully made known to the people of the country.

It is here suggested that the Commissioner of Agriculture is annually directed to expend a large sum of money for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of seeds and other things of this description, two-thirds of which are, upon the request of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, supplied to them for distribution among their constituents.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I believe the question is debatable, although I do not care to discuss the point of order as it is left to the Senate. As to the statement which has been made here that the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, reported the amendment adversely, I wish to say it is true, as I understand; but I desire to state in justification of the committee that while they did so it was not for want of sympathy. We discussed the matter, and there was a generous warmth of feeling on behalf of the drought-stricken people. At the same time the committee did not think the General Government ought to interfere in fire or flood or drought stricken districts or in the case of any of those misfortunes that come upon our citizens, believing that the States in which they were and the neighborhoods where they were would, when they were able, take care of the afflicted people and furnish seeds if it were necessary. The committee believed that it was not the province of the General Government to do that. That is what actuated the committee, of which I am a member, in making an adverse report.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. The Senator from Wyoming sends up and has read a veto message from President Cleveland, promulgated several years ago, when he was discharging the duties of his first term of office. That, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is the only instance in the history of the Government where there has been a veto message of that kind. By the act of April 11, 1882, $20,000 was appropriated upon the same principle that we ask this appropriation. The principle is equal in both instances, although the amount is different.

The condition of a portion of the country of which I have spoken is such as to demand at the hands of Congress some recognition. I am not acting unadvisedly. I have been in communication not only with the great portion of the people who were afflicted, but I have been in communication with the representative men of those people and the representative journals which are published in that section of the country. I know there is great distress in the transmissouri country. There is no use of disguising the fact. There is distress there. It is not confined to the State of Nebraska, either. It goes into the State of Dakota, the State of Kansas, the State of Colorado, and it goes into the State of Wyoming to some extent, or the people in portions of that State have misinformed me.

We but a few moments ago agreed to an appropriation of $40,000 to recapture some gypsy moths. They were brought into this country by a crank for the purpose of experimenting with them. They got away from him and are now afflicting the people of the State of Massachusetts. I voted for the appropriation because I believed it to be proper.

Is there anything wrong in giving some assistance to these people who are thus reduced? The Senator from Tennessee says it was not through want of sympathy that the Committee on Agriculture did not report the amendment favorably. I suppose not; but sympathy does not count in a case of this kind. I suppose it was on account of the Constitution coming in the road. The Constitution is made to do duty here on almost every occasion. Whenever the representatives of a certain locality think it ought to have assistance or aid the Constitution is not infringed upon; but the moment some other section of the country desires assistance then immediately the Constitution comes into view and immediately there is trouble.

I recall well when the Government brought relief to the fever-stricken people of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, when medicine and medical attendance, tents, and supplies of all kinds were furnished them; and I think the good people all over this country fully approved of it. I recall the time, also, when there was a proposition to establish a fever boat for the purpose of experimenting with the treatment or extinction of yellow fever down in that section of the country. I recall numerous instances where Congress has extended assistance to people afflicted in this way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senate can afford to make the appropriation proposed in the amendment. In many of the States east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Missouri River great losses have been suffered, and in thousands of instances those people are without seed grain to sow on their farms next year.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] says the States can take care of themselves. I represent in part upon this floor a State which unfortunately has reached the limit of indebtedness under its constitution, although that limit is but $1,000,000; and we are also unfortunate in the fact that the treasurer of our State, as is well known to everyone in this country, disappeared, carrying away all the funds which were in the treasury. The people of the State are therefore left in a condition where it is impossible for them to assist the drought-stricken people and to secure seed grain for those who have lost their crops. I know it is unpleasant to recite these facts before the American public, but the newspapers have already advertised them. While it is unpleasant, I feel it a duty to urge this appropriation to relieve the people who are struggling with the wilderness and striving to build up their States on those broad plains.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words only in reference to this matter. Differing as I do from my colleague, I find myself a little embarrassed at the fact. I do not think I would have presented the amendment, representing as I do here in part the State of Nebraska, one of the States that has suffered because of the great drought of last year, and from the partial droughts of years preceding. The State of Nebraska is not only one that is exceptionally fertile, but it is well if not thickly populated, and its citizenship is made up of a people as generous as those who exist anywhere in this country.

Last fall I traveled over many miles of that State and found desolation. I saw hundreds of miles of territory that I have seen heretofore producing good crops of small grain and corn now producing little or nothing, but at the same time there were the abundant evidences from those people of a determination to stand by their agricultural guns and hoping for the better times and better things sure to come to them. I saw in those parts of the State where there had not been a total loss a determination to help their brethren of the drought-stricken portion, and this they have done generously, abundantly, perhaps in some instances far more abundantly than their share of the world's goods would justify.

I have also seen as the result of appeals by letter, and to some extent in the public press, an outpouring from the abundance of different parts of our generous country. The South, with fraternal feeling and in recognition of a suffering it could assuage, has, from many portions of its territory, poured into Nebraska car loads of food, and from the East has come money, food, and clothing. While I was much grieved and distressed at the accounts that came to me by letter and otherwise in the early part of the fall and winter, I am glad to say that by this outpouring from their plenty by the generous people of the eastern part of our own State, and from the country at large the distress is rapidly disappearing.

I do not like the idea that the State which I in part represent here should come in forma pauperis to the United States and ask alms from the Government. I do not think the State of Nebraska needs assistance of that sort from the United States. At the same time I recognize the deplorable condition of other States described by their Senators as poorer than we are, which seem to demand aid, and if relief is needed, as is suggested by the Senators from South Dakota and the Senators from Kansas, if their need is so so much greater than ours—

Mr. PEPPER. The senior Senator from Nebraska could not have been in the Chamber when I addressed the Senate. I stated that the State of Kansas has already appropriated $100,000 to take care of our own people, and that the machinery of distribution has been in operation for several weeks.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am glad, then, to exempt the sister State of Kansas from the category in which I just placed it, and I am pleased to find myself in accord with the Senator from Kansas in stating that neither the Commonwealth of Kansas nor the great State of Nebraska desire to present themselves in the form of paupers or beggars to the United States Government. We will both take care of the matter at home, and I regret that my colleague has seen fit to put us in the attitude of this amendment before the American people.

Mr. President, if the need mentioned by my colleague were so great it seems to me the pending bill would not have come here from the House of Representatives without some suggestion being made by those who are the more direct representatives of the people. The pending appropriation bill comes to us without any provision of this character. Notwithstanding the fact that those States have their numerous Representatives in the House there is not only nothing of this character in the bill, but I hazard the assertion that there was no effort to obtain it by them. We are in straits to some extent, we are in distress, but as one citizen of the State of Nebraska I say we can take care of ourselves; and if the amendment shall pass I do not believe the Secretary of Agriculture will have a great many demands from the State that I in part have the honor to represent.

But if the condition is so bad as described in other States I shall be very glad to lend my vote to the amendment, for no constitutional question troubles me when it comes to relieving those who are really in distress or greatly need national aid. So far as that is concerned, I might quote from that Hibernian who a short time ago represented a great district in the other House, who suggested when he wanted a bill passed and a member of this body said to him he thought it was unconstitutional, "Why," said he, with his delightful accent, "what is the Constitution among friends?" [Laughter.] I might be willing even to question whether we should not somewhat strain constitutional provisions for the purpose of doing a great good.

But, Mr. President, I simply desire to say that so far as the State of Nebraska is concerned, I do not think it needs this alms at the hands of Congress. The legislature of that State is in session, and I think it has already taken steps toward the relief of some of those who are in distress, and I am proud of that self-helpfulness.

Mr. BATE. I merely wish to state that I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] will find himself mistaken, when he looks upon the statute book, in his statement that a statute was passed appropriating money for fever sufferers in Tennessee. I think that that is an error. The most that was done, as I recollect, was that army tents were loaned to the vast congregation of people who came to the valley at the time of the flood, and perhaps an amount of rations was given to them.

The State of Tennessee appropriated her money by State and counties when the yellow fever was there, and her active agents were at work to take care of her people. I think that was all that was necessary and it was successful; and the General Government never appropriated a dollar, so far as I know, for any such purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. I regret very much that my colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] should disagree with me in reference to this matter. I am very sorry indeed he did not come to me some weeks ago, when I introduced the amendment, if he thought it was improper, and make a friendly suggestion that he thought it was improper to ask Congress for any assistance for the drought-stricken portion of this country. I was very much in hope that the time which I am to serve with my colleague in this Chamber should pass without any interruption of our most friendly relations and of our determination to work in harmony for the benefit of our State.

I have not placed—and I wish to call my colleague's attention to that fact, so that I may not be misrepresented—the State of Nebraska here as a supplicant or as suing in forma pauperis. The statement is altogether gratuitous. I have said, and I repeat what is the truth, capable of demonstration, that there are thousands and tens of thousands of persons residing in the drought-stricken belt of this country, and that includes more than the western half of Nebraska, who must have some help outside of that which the States can afford them or they will not be able to plant their crops and sustain themselves. It is no part of charity and no part of modesty and no part of wisdom, in my judgment, for anyone to undertake to secrete the facts which are so well known to the world.

I have in my possession communications from the editors of the great journals of my State saying this measure is perfectly proper and is needed. I was in hope that the matter could pass through here without representation upon the one hand that the needs of a section of the State were so and so and a contradiction upon the other. I was in hope my colleague would join with me in giving to the people of the drought-stricken portion of this country some measure of relief, a measure of relief which they so sadly stand in need of. I am not mistaken when I say there is distress in the drought-stricken portion of the country; and I am sorry my feeble efforts here in behalf of those people are to be negated by the action of my colleague.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I wish to say one word before the question is put to the Senate. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to what the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] said. I wish to say now that if Nebraska will take care of the sufferers from drought, if Massachusetts will take care of the gypsy moth, and if Washington will take care of the sufferers from fire, Florida will endeavor to take care of those who have suffered from frost. At the time when I made the motion to amend, one of these measures had gone through by a majority of the Senate and the other appeared likely to go through without a division even, and I thought it was time that attention should be called to appropriations of this class. This is all I wish to say.

Mr. CALL. My colleague and I differ as do the Senators from Nebraska. I desire that every suffering man in the State of Florida, who has no means to provide himself with seed for the coming year, shall be furnished with it from the Agricultural Department of the country. I can see no difference between authorizing the distribution of seed from the Agricultural Department of those who are not destitute and giving it to those who can not obtain it without the action of Congress. There is no legislature sitting in Florida, and there will be none until it is long past the time when the people whose entire possessions have been destroyed will have the opportunity to plant in order to produce that which is necessary for their actual subsistence. The people of Florida are as patriotic and generous as any in the world, but they have none of that false sense of pride which will not accept that which is their due from the General Government in time of distress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the proposed amendment in order?

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The roll call was concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. PEPPER. Saturday, in the hurry of preparation, an amendment was adopted on my suggestion on page 16, coming in after line 15. Upon looking it over I find that there are a few words that ought not to have been incorporated. The words are, "or the edible products of the same." In order that I may make it clear to the Senate I want to have those words stricken out. I will read the paragraph.

Mr. CALL. What is the page?

Mr. PEPPER. On page 16. It was the amendment adopted on my suggestion concerning meat products. I will read the amendment as it was adopted, and then call the attention of Senators to the particular words:

The Secretary is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may decide to be necessary to prevent the transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, of the condemned carcasses or parts of carcasses of cattle, sheep, and swine.

Now, I want the next words that I now read, "or the edible products of the same," to be stricken out. Of course if the carcasses have been condemned there would not be any edible portion of them.

Mr. CALL and Mr. GORMAN. That is accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 23 of the bill, at the end of line 17, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $1,200 of said amount shall be expended for compensation and traveling expenses of local or special agents.

Mr. CALL. I do not see any propriety in that amendment. The matter is left to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GORMAN. That is precisely what I want to guard against. The provision as it here stands is the appropriation of a lump sum of $15,000 for examinations. In every bill we fix the amount that ought to be allowed for the compensation of special agents, so as to have the money used for what it is intended and not disposed of in the employment of people.

Mr. CALL. We have no information here that $1,200 will be sufficient compensation for the number of agents who are to go over this country, and it may entirely paralyze the appropriation.

Mr. GORMAN. Question.

Mr. KYLE. I submit that at the bottom of page 3 the salary of each one of these persons is fixed in the bill. It is done everywhere. These persons are to travel over the country and collect grasses. They are practically inspectors, so to speak, and $1,200 and expenses is sufficient.

Mr. CALL. Let us have a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 24, at the end of line 4, I move to insert the following proviso, which is the same exactly as the one just offered:

Provided, That not more than $1,200 of said amount shall be expended for compensation of local and special agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that there be a separate vote taken upon the gypsy-moth amendment, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment indicated will be reserved for a separate vote. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the reserved amendment adopted on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Massachusetts does not appear to be here.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. PETTIGREW. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. McPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], but I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] that we exchange our pairs and vote.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

Mr. VILAS. I vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] and withdraw my vote.

Mr. CAFFERY (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER]. I voted, but I do not see the Senator from Montana in the Chamber, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is recorded as voting?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with that Senator, but I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is absent, and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allen,	Dixon,	McMillan,	Proctor,
Allison,	Dubois,	Manderson,	Quay,
Call,	Frye,	Mantie,	Squire,
Cameron,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Stewart,

NOT VOTING—37.

Aldrich,	Hale,	Mitchell of Oreg.	Turpie,

Gallinger,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Gordon,	Martin,	Shoup,
Gray,	Mills,	Smith,

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLEN. I now renew the amendment I offered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after line 15 on page 9:

For the purpose of purchasing and distributing seeds and seed grains among the drought, frost, or fire stricken inhabitants of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, and in his discretion, under such rules as he may prescribe, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; the same to be made immediately available.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate has passed upon the amendment and determined that it is not in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I supposed it would be held to be not in order. I desire to call attention to the distinction made between the moth amendment and the seed amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated the action of the Senate in regard to it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2642, Order of Business 958.

Mr. HALE (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). Pending that motion, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. The first motion has not yet been stated from the Chair. The title of the bill moved by the Senator from Arkansas should be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the pending question. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HOAR. What is that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For information the title of the bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. That would displace the regular order of business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion that I may move to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is a motion pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can not entertain that motion at this time. The motion of the Senator from Maine is the pending question.

Mr. BUTLER. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], but I will transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] so as to enable the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I will again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. I vote "nay."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired ordinarily with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but I am assured by his colleague that he would vote "yea" if present, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I should like to inquire if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. McMILLAN. I vote "yea," transferring my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to my colleague [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired, by an arrangement with his colleague, with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. VILAS. This pair was announced with the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and the Senator from New York voted because the Senator from Massachusetts agreed with him.

Mr. BERRY. An arrangement was made by which the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the junior Senator from Kansas stand paired.

Mr. HOAR. The arrangement to pair my colleague was just made, twenty seconds ago.

Mr. VILAS. Oh.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggested that the Senator from Massachusetts be paired with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. VILAS. At the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. DIXON] I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR. I understand that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] stands paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRICE (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted when my name was called, but I am paired with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. Unless a transfer of pairs can be arranged I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has come into the Chamber and voted. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH], but I understand if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. He would vote "nay" if present.

Mr. PERKINS. I will permit my vote to stand unless his colleague advises me that I ought to withdraw it.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Allison,	Frye,	McPherson,	Quay,
Carey,	Hawley,	Manderson,	Vilas.
Chandler,	Hill,	Mitchell of Wis.
Davis,	Hoar,	Platt,
Dixon,	McMillan,	Proctor,

NAYS—36.

Allen,	Daniel,	Jones of Nev.	Pugh,

NOT VOTING—4.

Aldrich,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Sherman,
Blanchard,	Gordon,	Mills,	Shoup,
Brice,	Gray,	Mitchell of Oreg.	Smith,
Burrows,	Hale,	Morrill,	Vest,
Caffery,	Harris,	Murphy,	Washburn,

Callom,	Lindsay,	Pritchard,
Dolph,	Lodge,	Roach,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I now ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to taking up the bill moved by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORMAN. I rise to a question of privilege. The Senator from Arkansas has moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill designated by him. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moved to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator from Florida has made no such motion. He has not had the floor. I had the floor and made the motion, and I am entitled to a vote on the motion I have made.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the very point I raise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood the Chair to decide that the motion of the Senator from Florida was out of order. Am I correct?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was no motion made by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit it to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask for information, what was the motion of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. After the Senator from Arkansas had made his motion to proceed to the consideration of the silver bill, I moved to take up the Indian appropriation bill, and the Chair replied that he could not entertain the motion. That is the statement of fact.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit that under Rule IX the motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill takes precedence of the motion of the Senator from Arkansas. I will read from the rule as follows:

The following motions shall be in order at any time as privileged motions, save as against a motion to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or questions of privilege, to wit:

First. A motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation or revenue bill.

Second. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the Calendar, which motion shall not be open to amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me make an inquiry. The rule which the Senator from Maryland has just read states that a motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill or a revenue bill takes precedence of any other. Now, the point I wish to make is this: The motion to take up an appropriation bill having come in after a motion made by the Senator from Arkansas, does that rule apply?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER. That motion of the Senator from Arkansas was pending at the time the Senator from Florida made his motion.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will read the last clause of the rule, which answers the Senator's question:

Each of the foregoing motions—

A motion to take up an appropriation bill being first—shall be decided without debate, and shall have precedence in the order above named, and may be submitted as in the nature and with all the rights of questions of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Does that rule mean that that motion shall come while another motion is pending and the Senator is on the floor?

Mr. GORMAN. It means that a motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill or a revenue bill is in order, and takes precedence of any other motion in this body, and it must be decided in that way.

Mr. HALE. And is almost always made pending some other motion.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, always. It is just like a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Following the same line of thought as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I said that the motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill or a revenue bill is almost always made, because it is privileged by the rules, pending some other motion when the Senate has another bill under consideration or when a motion is made to take up another bill. I think there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. HILL. The rule says that such a motion shall have precedence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the language of Rule XXII, under which a motion to adjourn has precedence, and where various motions are recited.

Mr. HOAR. And it is in order pending other motions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, pending other motions. After reciting motions in their order the rule says:

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged.

The rule from which the Senator from Maryland has read uses these words:

And shall have precedence in the order above named.

And the idea that this precedence is blotted out if a subsidiary or inferior motion is first made, which seems to be the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], is not tenable.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I presume the Chair would hold if the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill should be voted down by the Senate, that then the Senate can proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill 2642 on my motion, if a majority of the Senate should favor that action?

Mr. HALE and others. Undoubtedly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule to which the attention of the Chair has been called by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and other Senators, the Chair is compelled to hold that the motion of the Senator from Florida is a privileged motion, which takes precedence under Rule IX of any other motion except a motion to adjourn. That is so clear that there can be no controversy about it, and the Chair, therefore, entertains the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. President, upon that motion of the Senator from Florida I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VOORHEES. Would that motion made by the Senator from Florida be good as against the motion of the Senator from Arkansas if the Senator from Arkansas was on the floor? The Senator from Florida did not have the floor to make any motion.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the inquiry I made.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a question of fact. I understand the fact to be that the Senator from Arkansas had the floor, and that the Senator from Florida does not contend that he had the floor over the Senator from Arkansas to make any motion.

Mr. HILL. He can now make it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Arkansas had exhausted his privilege when he made his motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. These are questions of fact. I have heard the statements of both Senators, and I state the facts correctly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In case the majority of the Senate should vote down the motion of the Senator from Florida, then the motion which I have presented, I presume, will be before the Senate for its action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt that is correct. The Chair desires to say in response to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] that the Chair was addressed by two Senators, and perhaps more than two, at the same time. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] was recognized and made his motion. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] then stated the motion, which was afterwards stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. The Chair was compelled to recognize the motion to which the rule gives precedence, and submits that to the Senate itself for the determination of the Senate as to whether it will entertain the motion of the Senator from Florida or that of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think there is any question about it. I think it is generally conceded that a motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill takes precedence, and if that be the view of the Senate, upon the motion of the Senator from Florida I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BATE. As to the status of the particular point involved I wish to say that I was close to the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Florida. I was struggling to get the attention of the President of the Senate to introduce a bill. The Senator from Arkansas had the floor, having been recognized by the Chair, and I failed to secure recognition to get my bill introduced because of the fact that that Senator had the floor. Meanwhile the Senator from Florida rose and made his motion to take up the Indian appropriation bill, but the Chair had already recognized the Senator from Arkansas, who still remained standing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated the rule as he understands it. It is for the Senate to decide. On the motion of the Senator from Florida the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President—

Mr. FRYE and others. Regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the vote is taken I desire to announce the fact that if the motion of the Senator from Florida shall be voted down I shall move the consideration of House bill 7373, to amend the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has not the floor to do that. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator from Arkansas has the floor, but I think perhaps I may be able to get it before this time to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE and others. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President—

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. GEORGE. I addressed the Chair before any response was made to the roll call.

Mr. FRYE and others. Too late.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. GEORGE. I inquire, first, what is the pending business on the Calendar, the unfinished business; is it not the bankruptcy bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That bill is the unfinished business. Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make a further inquiry: If the pending motion prevails, will not that displace the bankruptcy bill from being the unfinished business?

Several SENATORS. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. If that be so, I desire the Senate to understand what they are doing.

Mr. HALE. It would be equally true that the bankruptcy bill would be displaced if the motion of the Senator from Arkansas should prevail.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. That will displace the bankruptcy bill just the same.

Mr. FRYE. Regular order.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say a single word.

Mr. STEWART. I object to debate. Debate is out of order.

Mr. CALL. I do not want to debate. I rise to a question of personal parliamentary privilege.

Mr. STEWART. Objection is made.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator, if there be no objection.

Mr. CALL. I was charged by the Committee on Appropriations with the duty of making the motion I have made, and to press the appropriation bills until they are completed. I should not have any objection to the consideration of the bill which the Senator from Arkansas has moved to take up but for the instructions of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] and vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I will announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE], who is absent from the Chamber, is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN]. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to my colleague [Mr. BURROWS] and I vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH], but I am informed that he would vote "nay" on this question if present, and I vote "nay."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRICE (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who I observe is not present, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have been requested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. GALLINGER. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Now I ask for a vote on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a parliamentary question.

Mr. GEORGE. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain one at a time. The Senator from Maine is first recognized.

Mr. HALE. The pending business, the unfinished business before the Senate, is the bankruptcy bill, so known. I ask the Chair, if the motion of the Senator from Arkansas shall prevail, whether the bill he has in charge, and which he has moved to take up, will not take the place of the bankruptcy bill and become the unfinished business?

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. PUGH. We understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there is no doubt the statement of the Senator from Maine is correct.

Mr. HALE. The Senate ought to understand it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We do fully.

Mr. HALE. Then the bill for the coinage of silver will be the unfinished business?

Mr. PUGH. That is just what we are voting for.

Mr. GEORGE. I was about to make the same parliamentary inquiry which has been made by the Senator from Maine.

I wish to be indulged to say that, while I am in favor of the silver bill, I am also in favor of the bankruptcy bill and shall vote "nay" on the pending motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am in favor of the bankruptcy bill as it came here from the House of Representatives for the first time in my life, but the vote which takes up the bill referred to by the Senator from Arkansas and passes it can restore the bankruptcy bill to its place as the regular order.

Mr. PUGH. Yes.

Mr. HALE. At some time.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in favor of the bankruptcy bill and I am also in favor of the bill of the Senator from Arkansas; but I desire to give notice that if the motion of the Senator from Arkansas shall prevail I shall ask that that measure be temporarily laid aside with a view of taking up House bill 7273 to amend an act to regulate commerce, and upon that I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is not in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that debate is not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRICE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote "nay."

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] and vote. I vote "yea." If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). Under the transfer of pairs I have heretofore announced I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. I am informed that if that Senator were present he would vote in the affirmative. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). On this vote I transfer the pair I had with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. DIXON. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH], who is absent, is paired on this vote with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. If present my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON (after voting in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and voted under a misapprehension; but I will allow my vote to stand and transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] if he is not paired.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has been paired on all these votes for the last two hours with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. CAFFERY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], and in his absence I withhold my vote. The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 27; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. PALMER, and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized. The bill which the Senate has just voted to take up will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In view of the lateness of the session and the necessity for economizing time as much as possible, and in view of the fact that every member of the Senate has his mind made up whether he will or will not vote for this bill, I ask unanimous consent that some hour may be fixed on to-morrow at which a vote may be taken.

Several SENATORS. Now! Now!

Mr. HALE. There are too many absentees to vote now.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be glad to have a vote now, as there is a quorum present.

Mr. DANIEL. Every Senator is paired who is not here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be glad to have the vote taken now.

Mr. HALE and Mr. FRYE. Say 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am willing to have it fixed for to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator had better ask that consent to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock to-morrow the vote be taken on this bill and the amendments to it without further debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. VILAS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Then let us have a vote this evening, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Let us vote before adjourning.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sees that of course it will be impossible to get a vote to-night, beginning the consideration of the bill at this hour.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I recognize that fact and I was just going to say that I shall move that the Senate adjourn, and that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until there is a vote on this bill.

Mr. GORMAN, Mr. PLATT, and others. That is right.

Mr. HALE. You can not get a vote to-night.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator withdraw that motion one moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. For what purpose?

Mr. HALE. Regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to withdraw his motion for one moment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think that the Senate ought to adjourn. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 19, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 18, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

REPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriations submitted by the Secretary of State to meet the share of the United States in the repression of the African slave trade; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL COURTS, UTAH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of deficiency in appropriations for expenses of the Territorial courts of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WOODS HOLL, MASS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriations for repairing the harbor of refuge at Woods Holl, Mass., submitted by the Fish Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRELIMINARY SURVEY, RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House communications from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of preliminary examination by the Chief of Engineers of the following river and harbor improvements; which were referred severally to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

Cape Lookout Harbor, North Carolina; North East River, North Carolina; Nanticoke River, Delaware; Canaveral Harbor, Florida, and mouth of Cranes Creek, Florida.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 209) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver condemned cannon to Asher Gaylord Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Plymouth, Pa., and to Eckley B. Coxie Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Free-land, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read. The amendments were read at length.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally referred as indicated, namely:

A bill (S. 2726) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Lexington, Mo.," approved July 26, 1894—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2365) for the relief of Northup & Chick—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2377) for the relief of H. F. Menough, late postmaster at Rock Springs, Wyo.—to the Committee on Claims.

THOMAS CORRIGAN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also lay before the House at this time the action of the Senate on a House resolution recalling a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 5260) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Corrigan.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have just been talking with the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions with reference to this bill, and I ask that it be withheld for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be withheld temporarily on the table.

MOUNT VERNON MILITARY BARRACKS, ALA.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8680) granting the Mount Vernon Barracks Military Reservation to the State of Alabama for public uses.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read on Saturday, but objection was made to its consideration at that time by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. The Chair is informed that the objection is now withdrawn. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARKE of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EUNICE TAYLOR.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4792) granting a pension to Eunice Taylor, reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I object.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection, at least for the present, to permit me to make a brief statement.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York will be permitted to make a brief statement.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, Eunice Taylor, the beneficiary, served as a hospital nurse in the Army for over twelve months, seven months in the brigade hospital at Union Mills and Centerville in the latter part of 1862 and for part of 1863, and also five months and eighteen days at Fairfax Seminary Hospital, ending in June, 1875. A law was passed in 1892 giving to nurses who served six months a pension. It was found, by reference to the War Department, that she had served in Fairfax Seminary Hospital for five months and eighteen days, and she proved, by evidence beyond question, that she served in the Union Mills and Centerville brigade hospital for seven months. This seven months' service did not appear in the War Department records, and was not counted by the Commissioner of Pensions, and as her services in the other hospital lacked twelve days of six months her pension was refused. This brings the case squarely within the rules which govern Congress in passing pension bills.

Now, some member of the minority of the committee thought she might have served as a cook. There is no such evidence. I have a letter from Dr. Charles S. Hoyt, who is now the secretary of the Board of Charities of New York, one of the best known and most reputable men in the United States, who was an assistant surgeon at the Union Mills and Centerville hospital and knew this lady, stating that he often saw her in the wards of the hospital ministering to the sick and wounded, and that it was necessary for her or any nurse to go to the kitchen occasionally to prepare diet for the sick people. He says Dr. Hammond, who had charge of the hospital, often spoke of the valuable services of this nurse, and he often heard the wounded and sick soldiers commend her very highly for her services as a nurse. This old lady is now sick and paralyzed, and completely helpless and destitute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there ought not to be any objection to the consideration of this bill. I believe that every member in this House indorses the sentiment of John Tobin, that—

The man that lays his hand upon a woman,
Save in the way of kindness, is a wretch
Whom 'twere gross flattery to name a coward.

If there is such a man here, let him object to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia objects.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Shade of Martha Washington; the man hails from Virginia.

LIEUT. ROBERT B. TUBBS.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5206) for the relief of Robert B. Tubbs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on or about the 23d day of August, A. D. 1863, Robert B. Tubbs, as Lieutenant of Company I of the Eighth Regiment of Michigan Cavalry, was dishonorably dismissed from the service of the United States by General Field Order No. 7 of the Army of Ohio, with a forfeiture of all pay and allowances then due; and

Whereas said order was based on the finding of a court of inquiry at which no opportunity was allowed said Tubbs to either disprove the charges alleged against him or to produce any witnesses in his defense; Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said Robert B. Tubbs is hereby relieved from such dishonorable dismissal from the service of the United States, and such dismissal and the finding of judgment of said court-martial and the said General Order No. 7 is hereby declared void so far as it affects the said Robert B. Tubbs; and said Robert B. Tubbs shall be entitled to receive the pay and allowances of his rank due to him at the date of his dismissal, with pay and allowances of his rank for three months after the date of such dismissal from such service. And the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized to pay the said Robert B. Tubbs the amount that shall be found due him from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in explanation of this bill that Lieutenant Tubbs recruited a number of men for the Eighth Michigan Cavalry and earned thereby a lieutenant's commission. Serving in that regiment and engaged in pursuing the Southern commander, John Morgan, he became disabled by varicose veins and other diseases. After that raid he was sent home on a furlough by reason of the sickness incurred in that pursuit. While he was at home on a furlough his leave was extended a further time, and while he was thus at home and on leave, and so suffering, some complaint was made against him and the captain of his company, with some other officers of his regiment, on the charge of having made or assisted to make false musters.

A board of inquiry was convened, composed of three officers of his regiment, the Eighth Michigan Cavalry. This board of inquiry, composed of Lieutenants Wells, Baird, and Boynton, took the testimony of one man, and he testified that Lieutenant Tubbs had offered him a dollar to muster. Upon that testimony, forwarded to headquarters, without any hearing of Lieutenant Tubbs, either at that time or at any other time, and while he was at home sick and within his leave, he was dismissed from the service. In 1864 he made an application to have a hearing to be reinstated, denying under oath that he had made, assisted, or counseled false musters, and that application was denied, so that at no time did he have a hearing. There is on file with the committee the affidavit of every member of the board of inquiry that they subsequently learned that the man who testified against him was unworthy of belief, and they all say that this relief should be granted.

The bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and the reason that the application was not made sooner was because Lieutenant Tubbs did not know until a few years ago that Congress had the power, or that there was any power, to correct the injustice which had been done him. If any further explanation is desired I shall be glad to give it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I object.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 6723) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to convene from time to time, as he may deem proper, a board, to be composed of three surgeons of the Marine-Hospital Service, of which the Surgeon-General thereof shall be chairman, to examine and report upon all officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service who have become or may hereafter become incapacitated by reason of the infirmities of age or physical or mental disability not brought on by vicious habits of their own to efficiently perform the duties of their respective offices. And such officers as, under the terms of this act, may be reported by said board to be permanently incapacitated shall be placed on waiting orders out of the line of promotion, and the vacancies thereby created in the active list of officers shall be filled by promotion in the order of seniority, as now provided by law: Provided, however, That no such promotion shall be made until the professional qualifications of the candidate shall have been determined by written examinations before a board of officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service convened by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose: Provided further, That the number of officers upon the active list now authorized by law shall not be increased by this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations, not inconsistent with law, to properly and impartially carry into effect the provisions of this act and for the general government of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts conflicting with the foregoing are hereby repealed.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BRETZ. I object and demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. BRETZ and Mr. MALLORY.

Pending the division,

Mr. BRETZ said: Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that fifteen minutes' debate shall be allowed on each side, I withdraw the demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. A second will be considered as ordered, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] will be recognized to control fifteen minutes in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] fifteen minutes in opposition to the measure.

Mr. MALLORY. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Speaker, preliminary to what I have to say on this bill, I will read from the report of the present honorable Secretary of the Treasury, who concurs with all the Secretaries who preceded him during the twenty years past. He says:

The necessities of this service are constantly increasing, while its effective force is constantly decreasing, and unless some remedy is provided by Congress the time can not be very far distant when the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to seriously consider the propriety of discharging a number of superannuated and infirm officers in order to fill their places with others who are competent to discharge the duties of the positions which they now hold. Two of the officers now on the "waiting orders" list have been connected with the service more than sixty years, and several of them have served more than thirty years. They were appointed for life, and it would be a great hardship to drop them out of the service after they have become old and infirm without making some provision for them. They are now receiving the same pay from the Government that they would receive if the proposed bill should become a law, and we have in fact, therefore, a retired list, or "waiting orders" list, but without authority of law to fill the places of the officers who compose it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the line of sound public policy. No one disputes the propriety, the justice, or the good results of the retired lists of the Army and Navy of the United States. Those who have given the better part of their lives to the service of the Government, and by reason of such service have become incapacitated to labor or earn a living for themselves or family, ought not to be turned off in their old age, like worn-out and crippled horses, to starve and die. If this great country permitted this it would indeed prove the saying true that "republics are ungrateful." Every reason that exists for the creation and continuance of the retired list for the Army and Navy exists in as great a measure for the legislation called for by this bill.

I have been astonished at some of the assertions made by the opponents of this bill and at the objections made, not to speak of the ignorance displayed concerning this service, comparing it with the ordinary civil-service clerks in Departments, that work—or "attend," perhaps, is the better word—for seven hours a day for six days in the week, that is forty-two hours in attendance in each week and one hundred and twenty-six hours leave of absence each week, absolutely off duty. The revenue officer is practically on duty for one hundred and sixty-eight hours each week, the same as an officer in the Regular Navy when on shipboard.

The Revenue-Cutter Service is in every respect of the same character as service in the Navy; far more arduous and continuous, particularly during the time of peace, without the opportunity of promotion and distinction that is attached to the Navy. The service is substantially and practically a part of the naval force of the United States. It does not require any special training for a clerkship in the Departments, but it does to navigate and care for one of the revenue vessels in the most dangerous service in which any of the United States vessels are engaged.

Was the cutter Rush engaged in protecting the revenue when she was carrying the President's envoy extraordinary to Hawaii, by the President's orders, to pull down the American flag that some unauthorized persons had hoisted upon that island? Did he call on any of the employees under the civil-service rules or the merchant marine or a naval vessel? Not a bit of it. He ordered a revenue cutter to perform the duty.

Mr. Speaker, for twenty-five years I have resided at one of the Pacific seaports near the Mexican frontier. For eight years I was United States collector of customs for a district which included over 400 miles of the Pacific coast of California and 200 miles of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; and during this time I made the acquaintance of many army officers, many naval officers, and a number of revenue-marine officers. I saw and was on board many naval vessels at different times and a number of cutters. Of course I do not mention these facts as an evidence that I know as much about the Revenue-Cutter Service as the man who never saw salt water and would not know a revenue cutter from a stone boat if he saw them both together, but only as a sort of excuse for my remarks at this time.

Nearly twenty years ago I became acquainted with Captain Healy, now in command of the revenue cutter Bear, and last Saturday, after I had heard members talking against extending the retirement privilege to the Revenue-Cutter Service, I thought I would go up to the Department and take a look at his record. I found that he was commissioned March 7, 1865. He has, therefore, been in continuous service for twenty-nine years, for over twenty years in command of a United States vessel. During that time he has, at various times, had leaves of absence aggregating seven months, and has been on waiting orders two months and seven days, a total of nine months and seven days off duty in twenty-nine years, an average of about nine days per year. For nearly twenty years he has been on duty on the Pacific coast, going each summer to the coast of Alaska on the most dangerous service. His vessel has saved the lives of many seamen during that time. For nearly as many years I have known Captain Hooper, now in command of the cutter Rush, and his record is almost the same as Captain Healy's.

Compare the service of an officer of the Navy for the last twenty-nine years with that of one of these revenue officers. The custom which has come to have the force of law gives a naval officer, after having been three years' on duty at sea, three years shore duty. That is practically three years at home with his family, when he can set up housekeeping with the almost certainty of not being called to duty within that time; and so he alternates in periods of sea duty and three years at home until he is placed on the retired list by operation of law. The same is true of the army officer. Three years on duty on the frontier and then three years at some city post or at the capital; and how does the duty compare, even when the army officer is on the frontier? He has comfortable, roomy quarters, and if in command of the post he goes to sleep at night with the comfortable consciousness that his post is safely anchored and will not run on any rock and be wrecked while he sleeps, while the cutter officer must exercise almost constant vigilance to keep his vessel from being wrecked by icebergs or upon a rocky shore. There is no comparison between the services. The Revenue-Cutter Service is much more exacting and arduous, and requires much more care and responsibility.

The highest grade in the cutter service is captain. The pay is $3,500 a year while on duty; eighteen hundred on waiting orders. This rank is equivalent to that of lieutenant-commander in the Navy, which officer receives the first four years $2,800 per year, and after that three thousand, and goes on the retired list at 62 years of age by operation of law, a forced retirement.

A major in the Army is equivalent in rank to a captain in the cutter service. His pay is $2,500 for the first five years and 10 per cent added for each five years' service for twenty years, making his pay, after twenty years' service, $3,500, and he goes on the retired list at 64, although he may be in the very prime and vigor of his usefulness. I find by hasty perusal of the Army Register that there are 476 officers of the Army on the retired list, not including 17 chaplains who are on the retired list, all of the latter class except three having been appointed since the war, and each drawing from $123 to $147 per month. It does seem to me that a revenue-cutter officer who has served for from twenty-five to sixty years is better entitled to go on a retired list with three-quarters pay than a chaplain who served nine years at some comfortable post and goes on the retired list at almost full pay at his own request.

The following is a list of the chaplains on the retired list of the Army:

Number.	Appointed.	Retired.	Service.
One	1867	1879	12
Two	1870	1879	9
Two	1866	1882	16
One	1876	1885	9
One	1864	1885	21
One	1879	1886	7
One	1876	1886	10
One	1877	1888	11
One	1859	1888	29
One	1879	1889	10
One	1879	1890	11
One	1880	1890	10
One	1864	1890	26
One	1880	1891	11
One	1882	1892	10

I find also on the retired list: 7 medical inspectors, 4 pay inspectors, 7 paymasters, 3 assistant paymasters, 6 naval constructors, 14 carpenters, 4 professors of mathematics, 1 civil engineer, 13 sailmakers. And yet, in view of this list, members are holding up their hands in holy horror at the idea of putting on the retired list a few old officers who have served for from twenty to fifty years in command of United States vessels and are now incapacitated.

There are 37 vessels in the Revenue-Cutter Service, of which number 6 are on the Pacific coast, namely, the Bear, Corwin, Rush, Grant, Hartly, and Walcott. The latter vessel has recently been stationed at San Diego; is a small vessel and unfitted for the rough northern waters. The Hartly is used as a boarding vessel at San Francisco, is in constant use from one year's end to the other. The other four are in almost constant and arduous service in the open sea on the North Pacific coast. I am not qualified to speak of the vessels in this service on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, but I apprehend that the service on the New England coast is often as hazardous and attended with as great hardships as service on the North Pacific; but when I hear one talking about these vessels on the Pacific coast lying in port most of the time, and the officers dancing attendance on society, and spending their time drinking wine, etc., I know he is talking through his hat. There are 37 of these vessels in commission, but 211 officers of all grades, including the superannuated and disabled, who are on waiting orders. Only 8, or less than 4 per cent, are on special duty. Nine are in charge of life-saving stations, the most dangerous service of all. There are but 160 of all grades on vessels. Thirty-two are incapacitated for duty by reason of age or disabilities incurred in the service; and yet we have the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury, indeed of several Secretaries, that these revenue vessels have sailed more miles in the open sea than the whole Navy of the United States manned by 1,674 officers. But perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury is not as well posted on this service as some of the honorable members from the interior.

Mr. Speaker, if it were desirable and for the efficiency of the Army and Navy that officers be retired when they become old, disabled, or have reached a certain age, that younger, more vigorous men might take their places, is it not equally desirable that this same rule be applied to the Revenue-Marine Service? Shall we apply common sense to one service and not to another? A man disabled in the line of duty in the Army or Navy is placed upon the retired list. Here we have a chaplain who has performed the arduous duty of that position for seven years placed on the retired list, because, forsooth, he had reached a certain age. But the captain who has been in the revenue service for sixty-three years, and is now 64 years of age, having been in active service over forty years, can not be put upon that list, but must be kept on waiting orders while some lieutenant is performing a captain's duty. The officer that has been utterly disabled in this service for life can not be retired. What shall we do with such officers? Discharge them? Turn them off in their old age and helplessness? Common humanity forbids that. Why not apply sound common-sense rules to this service as we do to the Army and Navy? If the retired list is necessary and proper for one to secure efficiency, the same necessity exists for extending it to the Revenue-Marine Service.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my five minutes.

Mr. BRETZ. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words to the Democratic side of this House. I am neither the spiritual nor legal adviser of my Republican friends. They can do as they please. I am in no way responsible for their acts; but I have a right to appeal to Democrats. I will not be particeps to such reckless extravagance, I care not who recommends it or from what source it emanates. It is wrong in principle and ruinous in its consequences.

It has been so long since this bill has been discussed here that members are liable to forget what it is. If any Democrat on this floor votes for this bill, I intend that he shall distinctly understand that he is taking the initial step in laying the foundations for a pension roll from the civil list of this country, the ultimate expenditure for which no man can measure. The people of the United States are not ready for that step, wrong in theory and burdensome in practice. The generosity of this Government toward its soldiers and its sailors has been unexampled in the history of nations. We have a law that retires officers of the United States Army at the age of 64; we have another law that retires officers of the Navy at the age of 62. Whatever gratitude the people of the United States may feel toward the Army and Navy has certainly made itself abundantly manifest in those two laws. Now, here comes this bill and proposes to vest in the Secretary of the Treasury the power to call a board and retire a man of this Revenue-Marine Service and put him on three-fourths pay at any age, provided the Secretary of the Treasury happens to think it advisable.

My friend from California [Mr. BOWERS] says that this bill will not cost over $40,000 a year. That is only a starter. It will grow as the years go by. I appeal to the experience of the older members on this floor to testify that this is the same tale which has been told about every bill introduced in this House to begin a new raid upon the Treasury of the United States. The first demand always appears moderate. Give them an inch and they will take an ell. Now is the time to kill it. These men are simply in the civil service. They may be very estimable gentlemen; I do not dispute that; but they do not deserve any more consideration at the hands of the American people than a man who drives a mule team upon the highway, than a man who runs a reaper in his meadow, than a man who delves in the mines of the earth, than a man who runs an engine upon a railroad track. So far as I have been able to ascertain by inquiry and by listening, these gentlemen have a decidedly "soft snap" in this life. My friend from California says that one of them is 94 years old. Mr. Speaker, it appears that some of these men in those soft berths will live so long that they will have to be taken out on the day of judgment and shot to get rid of them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Does the gentleman begrudge such men their length of life?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say this in answer to that question: When a man gets too old to labor on a farm he quits; he does not ask for a pension. When he gets too old to serve as a clerk in a store he quits, and does not ask for a pension.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This bill does not add a cent of pay to the income of any one of these men.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But it adds from $40,000 to $100,000 a year to the amount of money the taxpayers of this country will have to pay. And that is only the entering wedge.

Mr. BOWERS of California. What is that when we are issuing fifty millions of bonds every three months?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And I am opposed to "issuing fifty millions of bonds every three months," or any other sum. [Applause.] I will never vote to issue a bond in a time of profound peace, never. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. I would not talk about a little thing like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suppose you would not. If I were on that side I would not talk about it, either.

As I was saying, when a man gets too old to teach school he quits; he does not ask for a pension. When he gets too old to practice law he quits; he does not ask for a pension. When he gets too old to practice medicine he quits; he does not ask for a pension. Nobody on earth seems to have any need for a pension except the men who have been billeted on the United States Treasury. These men run no risks; they take no extra hazards; they are well paid; and when they become too old for service, as honest men they ought to resign.

Mr. BOWERS of California. No one of these men has been asking for the passage of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who has been asking for it?

Mr. BOWERS of California. It is for the benefit of the service; it has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BOEN. Is it not a fact that the chief engineer of the Revenue-Marine Service has been here for months lobbying in favor of this bill? I refer to Mr. Collins.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will answer that question, if you will give me time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, it is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. But he has recommended several things which have not passed here. Consistency is a rare jewel. I wish to remind my Democratic friends that on every stump in the United States for thirty years we have talked about the extravagance of the Republican party. We have made the welkin ring with that cry. We have smitten them hip and thigh. We were elected on pledges of economy. Yet day after day and week after week some of the Democrats on this floor have stood here, or sat here, and voted for measures of extravagance which ought to make the hardest cheek on the Republican side of that aisle blush for shame. [Applause.]

Be ye not deceived. You can not delude the American people. Just as sure as you live, if you pass this bill it is but the setting in motion of a force that you can never resist, to place the clerks in the Departments on the pension roll when they get so old that they can not do anything; to place on the pension roll every man that is in Government employ—letter carriers, mail carriers, postal clerks, messengers—every class of officers. And in the days to come, when the Democratic party shall return to power in this House, and some man bobs up here with a bill to pension these departmental clerks and railway clerks and all the rest of such employees, and the Democrat who has voted for this bill gets up to oppose that measure he will be hooted down, as he will deserve to be. There is no trouble to stop a stream when it is only a small rivulet in the mountains, but when it has become a mighty torrent you can not dam it up or arrest its resistless flow. The place to stop this pension system, this civil-pension list, is at the very beginning, before it becomes a power in the land; in its very inception, before the first step is taken.

Mr. BOWERS of California. There is no question of pensions in this bill. It pensions no one, nor leads to any pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not object to the Republicans voting for it. They have a right to do as they choose, and they have championed many bad bills before, but they never passed any bill as bad, as extravagant, as uncalled for, as far-reaching in its evil consequences as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. And this legislation, let me say, was before the House in a Republican Congress, but never was enacted into law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. While this Congress has rendered some important services to the country, it may as well recognize the fact now that the dominant party here in control of this House, if it enacts such an infamous piece of legislation as this, will have to answer at the bar of public opinion in the years to come for this outrage committed upon the rights of the people. [Applause.] [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes accorded to me I want to say that I understand this bill, if it be enacted into law, will place 80 men now in the Revenue-Marine Service on waiting orders and at full pay.

Mr. BOWERS of California. No, not at full pay.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have but a moment or two, and I can not yield to the gentleman for an interruption.

I understand it will beget promotions to fill their places all along the line, getting increased rank and increased salary. I understand, further, that it will make 30 vacancies for new officers in the Revenue-Marine Service.

Now, I doubt very much the propriety of enacting any such legislation as this. We have the Army and we have the Navy representing the armed forces of the Government. While it is true, no doubt, that this is an exceedingly meritorious service, yet it is after all a civil service, and under the control of the Treasury Department. It may be that we are approaching the time when we must come to the English system. If that be true, let us have the English system at a decreased expense.

Let us commence it at the lower salaries and quit at the lower salaries, and then retire the officials on half pay. But there is no more reason, in my judgment, that a provision of this kind should be made with reference to the Revenue-Marine Service than in regard to the postal service. Besides that, the railway postal employees are not nearly so well paid. It is also a more dangerous service; it is a service that requires more industry and necessitates as much discipline with equal ability on the part of the men to make it a success. I think, therefore, that we had better halt and consider a little while before taking this step. But if we do take a new departure and go to the English system, let us have the virtues as well as the evils of the system at the same time.

For these reasons, and for others which might be urged if the time allowed, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, some reference has been made to the position of the Republican party in respect to certain public questions. I want to say this in answer to the suggestion, that so far as I can recall the legislation of this country that great party has never enacted any measure looking to the establishment of a civil pension list.

In the few moments remaining I do not desire to make any partisan appeal to the House on this question. My appeal is rather to the conscience and good judgment of members on both sides of this Chamber. I ask them to vote against this measure, which is but the initial step beckoning us to the establishment of a civil pension list not only in the Revenue-Marine Service, but if this bill becomes a law it will be followed by others in the same line in behalf of the Railway Mail Service, as well as other branches of the civil service. I submit, sir, that the present is not an opportune time to inaugurate a policy that will establish an enormous civil pension list.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to which I am entitled to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Speaker, it seems an exceedingly easy matter for gentlemen from their places on this floor to indulge in impassioned appeals to their political associates for party action upon a measure like this, a measure absolutely devoid of even the slightest partisan feature.

It is matter of infinite surprise that gentlemen who are ordinarily just in their treatment of public matters and conservative in their utterances concerning them should take occasion, as they have just done, to denounce in the strongest terms this measure designed to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Marine Service.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has made his appeal to the Democratic side of this Chamber. My appeal shall not be to party associates alone, but to fair-minded members on both sides of the House, whose only desire is to determine this measure simply and solely upon its absolute merits.

Nor shall this appeal be mine alone. A distinguished Democratic statesman, who, from his official position and his close knowledge of the subject, speaks with authority, asks this House to-day to adopt this measure as a matter of simple justice to the Revenue-Cutter Service. Secretary Carlisle sends to us over his own signature a statement to the effect that the necessities of the service are constantly increasing, while its effective force is constantly decreasing. He tells us in no uncertain terms that unless affirmative action is taken by Congress he will be compelled to turn away in their old age a number of superannuated and infirm officers and to fill their places with others more competent to discharge the duties of the positions they now hold.

There is, I submit, something of pathos in Mr. Carlisle's statement. These worn-out veterans were appointed for life. They have served their country faithfully and well. The Secretary tells us in substance—and I affirm the justness of the statement—that it would be a grievous wrong to drop these gallant men out of the service now in their season of old age and physical infirmity without making some provision for them.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not by any means a matter of sentiment alone. This feature is only secondary. The interests of the Government are involved here, and the title of this measure, "A bill to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Marine Service," is not a misnomer. Let us impartially consider the conditions as they present themselves to us. Some thirty of the officers of this service have become too old or infirm for active duty. They are borne on the rolls of the Government and receive full pay.

The Government is not receiving the full benefit of their services, and younger and more active men, able and properly ambitious to take their places, are kept in the background. The proposition is to place these superannuated officers on waiting orders out of the line of promotion, with the pay which would accrue to them under these conditions. The promotion of younger officers in the order of seniority, as now provided by law, would follow and would naturally make this important service much stronger and much more efficient. But all this will cost the Government something, say our friends on the other side.

Why, of course it will. Nothing good or beneficial comes either to governments or individuals without something in the way of cost. There is no concealment about the figures here. It will entail a charge for the first year of the operation of this measure, if enacted into law, of $45,000.

Each year thereafter the expense will decrease in the natural order of things, until in a very few years the annual cost will not exceed one-half the sum named.

Mr. Speaker, always in the past, Federal legislation has discriminated against this branch of the sea service. Solely by reason of the fact that it is under the direction of the Treasury Department, it is not accorded many of the benefits accruing to the Army and Navy. And yet the service is essentially a naval service, as I shall hope to demonstrate to the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. CLARK and Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who have so vigorously opposed this measure.

This service has no retired list such as the Army and Navy have. It has no longevity pay. No vacations or furloughs with full pay are granted to its officers such as are accorded to the officers of the Army and Navy. If an officer of the Revenue-Marine Service falls ill and is thus prevented from the performance of his work, his pay is doctored until his return to duty. In the matter of compensation for services faithfully performed his pay is less for his grade than that granted to an officer of similar rank in the Navy. Buffeted by winds and waves and exposed to all the dangers of the ocean in times of peace, and suffering all the hardships of the naval officer in time of war, the very highest rank a revenue-marine officer can obtain after years of conscientious duty is that of captain.

While the upbuilding of the American Navy has been a labor of love with many patriotic lawmakers, next to nothing has been done during the last quarter of a century to strengthen the Revenue-Cutter Service. Why this undue partiality has been exhibited, why this unjust discrimination has prevailed, can only be accounted for upon the theory that potential social forces have been behind the Navy and that these aids have been wanting in the case of the service now under discussion. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this unfair distinction has been continued long enough. The claims of a most gallant and meritorious class of officers should receive at the hands of Congress the measure of simple justice which their deserving demands.

Do gentlemen who are hostile to this measure realize what this service really is? The assertion has been broadly made to-day that it is but a part of the civil branch of the Government. I challenge the correctness of this statement. The very reverse of it is true. No one not fully qualified as a sailor can hold a commission in this service. No officer is permitted to enter it, and none can receive promotion in it until he has passed a most rigid professional examination.

Officers of the Army and Navy are commissioned for life, and so, too, are the officers of the revenue marine. Just as officers enter the Army or the Navy, so entrance is gained in this service. Political influence has absolutely nothing to do with it, and merit alone governs promotion from the lowest to the highest grades. The officers and men thus enlisted, even in times of peace, are called upon to peril their lives in the performance of their duties. The customary cruising grounds of the cutters are along the coast lines—admittedly the most dangerous to navigators. Much of the work of the service is done in the most inclement seasons, when the duty of rendering aid to crews and vessels in distress is enjoined upon this service by the statute law of the land.

All this, Mr. Speaker, would not, perhaps, relieve the men of the cutter service from the charge of being a part of the civil force of the Government. But there are other features which clearly mark the service as part and parcel of the military establishment. From the very earliest years of our national existence, antedating, in fact, the formation of our Navy, the vessels of the revenue marine have been, as they are to-day, armed cruisers. They have always been, as they are to-day, manned by regularly enlisted and uniformed men, commanded by officers who are commissioned under official titles by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

A discipline as strict as that prevailing on board a man-of-war is observed on the deck of every revenue cutter. Proficiency in naval drills and the knowledge of the use of arms are required on the part of every one of these enlisted men. What are the ordinary duties of this service, which gentlemen have persisted in saying is a part of the civil establishment? The law of the land enjoins upon it the work of enforcing the quarantine laws, the suppression of mutinies, the enforcement of the neutrality laws, the suppression of piracy, and the use of its armed force in the protection of the revenue. By a simple order, issued at any time, either during a period of peace or in a season of warfare, the President of the United States may order this service to act in conjunction with the Navy in offensive or defensive operations upon the coast lines or upon the high seas. This authority conferred by law upon the Chief Executive has been repeatedly exercised.

The pen of the historian has again and again told the story of gallant deeds performed by the officers and men of this service in many a scene of danger and destruction. From the very inception of our Government, in every warfare on the ocean in which this country has been engaged, the crews of the fleet revenue cutters have joined with the men on board our battle ships in loyal service for the supremacy of the flag under which they sailed. [Loud applause.]

Do you deny it, you gentlemen from Missouri, who have claimed that this service is but a part of the civil establishment? Do you deny it, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has expressed the fear that this measure is but the initiation here of the English method of retirement?

In the face of the facts here presented, can you see nothing about this service which entitles it to the relief now sought to be extended?

"The initiation of a general system of retirement," say some of the gentlemen who have opposed this measure. "The eventual pensioning of the men of the Railway Mail Service and of all other civil employees of the Government," says the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. Why, Mr. Speaker, what man in the civil service is compelled to work more than a fixed number of hours each day? The law and departmental regulations provide for this. In fact, the law prohibits the labor of many civil employees beyond a fixed limit of time each day.

What man in the civil service can, solely by reason of his public employment, be compelled by a simple order of the President to summarily leave home and family and bear arms upon the high seas in defense of his country? Not one. And yet the officers and men of the Revenue-Cutter Service are very often by the exigencies of the occasion compelled to the severest labor continuously, by night as by day, amid storm and danger, without rest, and at the risk of their lives, and all this during seasons of profound peace.

And if war should come again they would undoubtedly be called, as they have been repeatedly called in the past, to the same heroic endeavor that has brought to them abundant honor and glory, but no substantial benefit or advancement.

Can any further evidence be demanded, Mr. Speaker, to establish conclusively the military character of the Revenue-Marine Service? If such evidence were needed, it is, I submit, found in the fact that among the superannuated officers sought to be placed on waiting orders by the terms of this bill are some who are to-day suffering from wounds received in the discharge of duty and in the service of their country.

No plea goes up from any source that this House shall be unduly generous in this regard, but I beg that it may at least be just in the action it shall take to-day.

The adoption of this provision is demanded alike in the best interests of the public service and as a measure of simple justice to a body of most faithful and deserving men.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Florida, to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 86.

So the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was lost.

SURVIVORS OF MEXICAN AND INDIAN WARS AND THEIR WIDOWS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES], from the Committee on Pensions, is recognized, at the instance of that committee, to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7414) granting increase of pension to survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars and to their widows.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, allowed to Mexican and Indian war survivors and their widows, under the provisions and conditions contained in the act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes, approved January 29, 1837, the act granting pensions to Powell's Battalion, Missouri Mounted Volunteers, approved March 3, 1861, and the act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, approved July 27, 1862, shall be rated and paid at $12 per month.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, let us have a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SAYERS, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. MOSES, to act as tellers.

The tellers proceeded with the count.

Pending the count,

Mr. SAYERS. I withdraw the demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have an explanation of the effect of this bill.

[Mr. MOSES withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. WISE. By direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 2377) to amend "An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the regulation of steam vessels," approved August 7, 1882; and also to amend section 4414, Title LII of the Revised Statutes, "Regulation of steam vessels."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the "Act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved August 7, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out from the first section thereof all after the word "aforesaid," in the fourteenth line of said section, also section 2 to 6, inclusive, of said act.

SEC. 2. That section 4414 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4414. There shall be, in each of the following collection districts, one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers, namely: The districts of New York, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; Albany, N. Y.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; New Orleans, La.; Norfolk, Va.; St. Louis, Mo.; Dubuque, Iowa; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Port Huron, Mich.; Willamette, Oreg.; Portland, Me.; Puget Sound, Washington; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Louisville, Ky.; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Gallipolis, Ohio; Wheeling, W. Va.; Superior, Mich.; Burlington, Vt.; Apalachicola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; and Providence, R. I.

"The inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers in the districts enumerated in the preceding paragraph shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, namely:

"In districts inspecting less than 150 steamers, to a salary of $1,500 per year each.

"In districts inspecting 150 and less than 200 steamers, to a salary of $1,800 per year each.

"In districts inspecting 200 and less than 300 steamers, to a salary of $2,000 per year each.

"In districts inspecting 300 and less than 500 steamers, to a salary of $2,250 per year each.

"In districts inspecting 500 steamers and upward, to a salary of $2,500 per year each.

"The Supervising Inspector-General shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury, at the end of each fiscal year, the number of steamers inspected in each local district in that year, which number shall be the basis upon which shall be determined the salaries to be paid to local inspectors for the following fiscal year, in the ratio described in the preceding paragraphs of this section. And, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint upon the nomination of the supervising inspector of the district, in collection districts where there are 255 steamers and upward to be inspected annually, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the district of New York, of $2,000 a year each; for the district of New Orleans, La., of $1,800 a year each; for the district of Boston, Mass., and San Francisco, Cal., at $1,500 per year each; and for all other districts at a salary not exceeding $1,000 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid for his actual and reasonable traveling expenses at the rate of 8 cents per mile, incurred in the performance of his duty, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. WISE. I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. CARUTH. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. WISE and Mr. CARUTH as tellers.

Pending the division,

Mr. WISE said: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] agrees that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to control the time in favor of the proposition, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] against it.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement which I think will convince every member of this House on both sides that this bill ought to be passed, and I will say here that it is opposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] only because a citizen in his district will not get under this bill quite as much salary as he is now drawing. I think I will convince every gentleman who will give me his attention that the constituent of my friend ought not to receive as much salary as he has been drawing—

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. WISE. One minute. Let me explain this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to equalize the salaries of inspectors of boilers and hulls in the various districts of the United States. They were fixed in 1871, more than twenty years ago, and then they were fixed equitably, upon the basis of inspections then made in the various districts. But great changes have taken place since then, and I will illustrate so that the members of this House will see the attitude of my friend from Kentucky. The inspector at Louisville, Ky., is receiving a salary of $2,000 per annum. He inspects 57 vessels and that is all. The inspector at Cleveland, Ohio, inspects 308 vessels, doing almost six times as much work, and he only receives $1,500.

The inspector at Louisville—I want the members of this House to keep in mind that officer, so that they can understand the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky when he rises—the inspector at Louisville, who only inspects 57 vessels, gets $2,000 a year, and the inspector at Oswego, N. Y., inspects 129 vessels, or more than twice as many, and he only gets $800 salary. These inequalities are so glaring, they are so unjust, that the Supervising Inspector-General of Steam Vessels has for years called upon Congress to equalize these salaries. The purpose of this bill is to do that, and to keep them in a state of equalization. If you pass this bill the injustice of which I have spoken will be done away with, and it can never again exist.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WISE. One moment, if the gentleman will allow me. We abolish the office of inspector of foreign vessels, because it is a sinecure, and if any duties of that kind are to be performed we impose them upon the local boards. Now, one word for the ears of my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and all the watch dogs of the Treasury. [Laughter.] And I want my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to hear this statement, too, because I want him to have an opportunity to go to his home and tell his people that one Democrat from Virginia did introduce a bill which would reduce expenses. This bill not only does justice, but it saves to the Government about $18,000 per annum.

Mr. GROUT. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. WISE. I thought if you would let me make my statement I would get to that. I say it saves $18,000 per annum. Now, gentlemen, I have explained this bill. It has passed the Senate in four or five Congresses, and has failed to pass the House because you would not give me an opportunity to present it.

You will hear from two gentlemen from Kentucky in opposition to this bill, because both of them have constituents who will have to stand a reduction because they do not do the necessary amount of work. I beg you, in the name of justice and in the name of economy, all of you, to rally to my support this time and give me a two-thirds vote. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CARUTH. I now yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. WISE. One moment before the gentleman from Kentucky proceeds. I wish to say to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] that I always desire to treat him with perfect respect, and I intended before taking my seat to offer him the opportunity for the question which he intimated he wished to ask. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GROUT. Some of us would like to know what the effect of this bill will be upon the inspector in the district of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. We have none there. But, sir, it does not make any difference what the district may be. The salary is graduated every year by the number of inspections the officer makes.

Mr. GROUT. That is right.

Mr. TRACEY. Are we to understand that the Department has recommended the passage of this bill?

Mr. WISE. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. CARUTH. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the minimum salary under this bill is to be $1,200 or $1,500?

Mr. WISE. One thousand five hundred dollars is an amendment of the committee.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not understand this is the bill as it comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MALLORY. The committee has recommended an amendment fixing the minimum salary as $1,500.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] ought not to mistake the action of the committee. The amendment recommended will be found in the report. The gentleman from Kentucky is so anxious about his constituents that he has not examined the bill.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then I understand the committee has offered an amendment fixing the salary at $1,500?

Mr. WISE. Making that the minimum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, it is very true that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, in a spirit of liberality, has offered to amend this bill so as to increase the salaries of the inspectors at Louisville and Cincinnati from $1,200 to $1,500. But that is not the increase that we want in order to enable us to support this bill. We want the salaries of our inspectors of boilers and hulls to remain at $2,000 a year, because a less salary than that will not secure the experience and the ability necessary for the perfect inspection of vessels. If there be any purpose at all in the institution of the inspection service as now existing under the laws of the United States, it is to secure from danger the property and the persons passing over the rivers of this country as well as the high seas.

It takes as much ability to determine whether one steamer is in condition to ply upon the waters of the country as it does to inspect a hundred steamers; and whether the officer inspects fifty or one hundred vessels or any other number, he must always be there ready to perform duty. The amount of time taken in actual inspection of vessels is not the controlling consideration. I have for years been the owner of steamers on the Ohio River; and I understand the methods of inspection. Notification is sent to the inspector that he is needed upon a particular steamer, the inspection of which is due; it must occur once a year. The boat is prepared for the inspection. Her boilers are cleaned out and filled with cold water. Another steamer comes alongside and attaches her pumps. The inspector puts his gauge upon the end of the boiler, and as the steam is applied from the other vessel he watches to see the effect upon that boiler, its valves, etc.

When it reaches, we will say, 175° the inspector directs the engineer to stop the machinery at that point; and he examines how much pressure the boiler of that steamer can stand. This is the work of only two or three minutes. An engineer appointed to inspect boilers can inspect one hundred in a day if they are ready for the inspection. But he must be able to determine whether the boilers are in good condition. He must empty the boilers of water; and then he must pass a light around to see that the iron is not blistered in any way, so as to determine whether the boiler is safe. In addition to that the man who inspects the hulls has unlimited power to go upon any vessel on the Ohio or the Mississippi rivers, costing, we will suppose, $100,000, and taking his chisel he may go through the woodwork and determine whether the gallow's frame or the water beam or any other piece of the boat's hull should be taken out; and if he says so the boat is required to go to the ways that the proper repairs may be made. Thus the power of an officer of this kind is almost arbitrary. He ought, therefore, to be a man of fine judgment.

If the gentleman wants to increase the salary of this official at Norfolk in which he is interested—because every Virginian is interested in anything pertaining to that city—let him bring in a bill to increase the compensation at Norfolk from $1,200 to $2,000—

Mr. WISE. I am not proposing to increase anything.

Mr. BERRY. I will aid the gentleman in his endeavors to secure a compensation for this official at Norfolk which will be adequate if the present salary is not enough. But do not come into Kentucky, where we have the very best inspection service that the country can produce anywhere, and interfere with the officials at Louisville and Cincinnati and cut their salaries down as this bill proposes. Why, at Cincinnati alone, and between there and the pleasure grounds near the city, 100,000 people are transported every summer on these river steamers, and we need an adequate inspection of the vessels to insure their safety. Do not come, therefore, and cut down our salary. We are perfectly willing to help you with your Norfolk increase. I would agree to vote either the steamboat inspector or the inspector of hulls and boilers at that place a salary of $2,000 if he is a competent man.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Does not the gentleman think that the inspectors at Cleveland and Buffalo and Detroit ought to have their salaries increased, too?

Mr. BERRY. Well, increase them all if you think it necessary. I think, if they are competent men, they ought to have good salaries. None of these men who are able to do the work receive more than they ought to. Why, this inspector at Cincinnati was subjected to some sort of a civil-service examination before some commission. I do not know whether it was sent out by the Civil Service Commission or not, but he was compelled to answer very difficult questions, and had to be able to extract cube root, the square root, and other roots of numbers, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself could not have answered the questions propounded to that man; and yet he made a satisfactory showing and passed the examination. Several were rejected who could not pass at all. It is an office requiring a great deal of judgment and skill. I am ready now, I repeat, to help the gentleman from Virginia to increase the salary of the Norfolk official, in whom he takes a special interest, and am willing to vote $800 more for the Norfolk man if he will not interfere with our service.

For twenty years at Cincinnati we have had the very best steamboat-inspection service that the country could afford.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in his very calm and quiet manner [laughter] has addressed the House upon this subject and has taken occasion to refer to me personally. He says that my opposition to this bill simply arises from the fact that one of my constituents would be cut down in his salary $500 a year.

I will see his one and go him one better. Two of my constituents would be cut down $500 each, and I think that would be a sufficient reason for me, as the local representative of that district, to oppose this bill. But that is not the main objection I have to the passage of the measure. I may turn with as much truth upon him; I may say with as much earnestness as the gentleman from Virginia, though I could not possibly use such earnestness as he does—no man can—but I might turn to the gentleman from Virginia and say that his enthusiasm in the cause of the inspection of steam boilers and the hulls of steam vessels is not from any patriotic desire to serve the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who owns all the money in the Treasury of the United States [laughter].

Mr. BOATNER. Do not forget the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CARUTH. Or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], his able lieutenant on the floor, but it comes from a patriotic desire to increase the pay of the inspector of steam boilers at Norfolk from $1,200 to $2,000 a year. In other words, the gentleman from Virginia is anxious to take off of Kentucky and put on to Virginia, and I am opposed to that.

Now, the people of Kentucky have done more for the people of Virginia than any people on the face of the earth. The first families of Virginia have all migrated to Kentucky. [Laughter.] And I want to tell you, and I want the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to hear me—I insist on your hearing this—[laughter]—that the people of Kentucky have been very kind to the people of Virginia. No sooner had the war ended than every able-bodied man who could get out of Virginia started over into Kentucky, and as soon as his foot touched the other side of the Alleghenies each one immediately announced himself as a candidate for some lucrative office, and by the eternal he got it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WISE. Will you permit me just there?

Mr. CARUTH. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. They went to Kentucky to have a good time, and they all returned home drunk in the morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. Well, that shows the truth of the statement that Hon. James A. McKinzie made on the floor of the Chicago convention, that the liquor of Kentucky is so good that intemperance is a virtue. [Laughter.]

But this is not a fight between the State of Virginia and the State of Kentucky, as the gentleman from Virginia would try to make us believe; this is a fight against a system that has existed in this country for twenty years and more. The inspectors of steam vessels, boilers, and hulls at the ports of Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio, ever since the inauguration of this system, have been paid $2,000 a year for their services, and they have earned it.

The reason why that salary was put at $2,000 a year was because of the important service rendered by these officials, and it was because of the efficiency and the zeal of these men in the discharge of their duty. It was because the craft that ply the Ohio River and the Mississippi River were greater than the small craft that sail around and about Norfolk, Va. It was in order that the lives, and the limbs, and the property of the citizens traveling by vessels upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers might be preserved, that it was deemed necessary that they have an efficient inspection of the steam vessels. Why was the distinction made if that is not the reason? The statute of the United States fixed the compensation many years ago.

Gentlemen will find it in the Revised Statutes, and if the price was fixed more at Louisville and more at Cincinnati in proportion to the number of vessels inspected it was because the vessels there inspected were more important than the small vessels that ply the waters referred to. The vessels inspected at Louisville and Cincinnati are large water craft, large freight carriers, and large passenger boats that go down the Ohio and out to and down the Mississippi River to the city of New Orleans. The work the inspectors of these vessels are called upon to perform is important work, and $2,000 a year is little enough to pay for their services. If the gentleman is not satisfied with the compensation paid for the inspection of steam boilers at Norfolk, and can show that the Norfolk men should receive more money, I will unite with him to raise the price, but I am not willing that what is taken off of Kentucky shall go to the State of Virginia. We have been good enough to the Old Dominion, I believe; and when we come to take a vote upon this bill I do not think it ought to pass.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has four minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky has two minutes.

Mr. WISE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a bill for the equalization of the pay of inspectors of boilers and hulls, and at the same time it reduces the expenses of the United States Government. As it is now, as referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, the inequalities of the pay of these inspectors at a number of points is so great that it is necessary that something be done to equalize them. Take, for instance, Seattle, in Washington. The inspectors at Seattle, Wash., inspect 206 vessels per annum, and they receive for that service only $800 a year; whereas the inspectors at Cincinnati inspect 93 vessels and receive $2,000 a year. The inspectors at Nashville inspect 77 vessels and receive $1,200. At Louisville, as has been said, they inspect 57 vessels and receive $2,000.

Now, the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] is undoubtedly a very strong one so far as it goes. It is necessary that these inspections should be done by competent men. They should be qualified in all particulars for the duty, and they should give thorough and careful inspection. But while no one will dispute, the probability is, that the inspectors at Louisville in inspecting the 57 vessels that they do inspect give good service, and that they are careful, painstaking, and very observant. It must also be admitted that the inspection of these 206 vessels that are inspected at Seattle, where the compensation is $800, or the 485 vessels that are inspected at Boston, where the inspector receives $2,000 salary, is of exactly the same careful character.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that there are vessels plying between Cincinnati and the city of Louisville, and from Madison to Cincinnati, and Cincinnati, Louisville, and Madison, that carry probably every day 1,500 passengers; and they, of course, require very careful and repeated inspections.

Mr. MALLORY. I have but two or three minutes, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. That may be. But there will also be found large vessels at many of these ports, even larger than those inspected at Louisville. Now, there certainly can be no question as to the advisability of the passage of this bill. It equalizes but does not reduce the pay beyond a legitimate and proper compensation. It seeks to procure competent men; and the bill provides, in the amendment inserted, that the minimum for any of the inspectors shall be $1,500, instead of $800 as now.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question for information? What means is taken for the selection of these men, and who are they selected by?

Mr. MALLORY. They undergo an examination.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky has two minutes.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, in response to the statement of the gentleman from Florida, that the inspector at Louisville was confined to 57 vessels, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not the number of vessels that are inspected, but it is the number of inspections made. Now, in the city of Louisville we have a large boat-building establishment that builds steamers for use on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; and while the number of these vessels inspected may be 57, that does not mean the number of inspections, because some of these vessels may require an inspection several times each season. A good many of these vessels are employed in the pleasure trade, carrying people on excursions, and very frequently these vessels have to be inspected every day or every week or so.

So the number of vessels inspected is not a fair criterion. They ought to give the number of inspections made, in order that we might know whether this work at Louisville is in proportion to the work at other places.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is one inspection a year a safe test?

Mr. CARUTH. No, sir; once a year is not a safe test, and I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that it is made more frequently than that. There is no day in the week that some inspection of vessels is not made in the city of Louisville. I state that from my personal knowledge.

Mr. STEPHENSON. The law only requires one inspection a year.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have one minute remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. WISE. In that one minute I want to say that this bill treats the inspector at Louisville, Ky., exactly as the inspectors everywhere else are treated. We give him a salary for the work he performs and we give every other inspector a salary for the work he performs. This bill makes equal the salaries of these inspectors, which have been unequal for a period of twenty years.

Mr. SIMPSON. This bill pays them in proportion to the work they do.

Mr. WISE. It pays them in proportion to the work done, and the Government will save $18,000 per annum.

Mr. BERRY. Would it not be just as well to equalize up as to equalize down?

Mr. WISE. We want to equalize the thing squarely.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CARUTH demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 118, noes 12.

Mr. BERRY, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, and others made the point of no quorum.

Mr. WISE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BERRY. I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] withdraws the point of no quorum. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, at the time the gentleman from Kentucky rose to make the point of no quorum I also rose and made the point of no quorum, and I have not withdrawn the point.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Two or three gentleman made the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to make the point.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I was one of those who made the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will, of course, recognize the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to insist upon the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WISE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 167, noes 13. Accordingly, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ALTAMONTE WATER COMPANY.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7956) to authorize the Altamonte Water Company to flood certain lands on the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, pursuant to authority granted by the Secretary of War to erect a dam across the St. Louis River, in said State, upon payment of the value of same, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, the money to be paid into the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of the Fond du Lac tribe of Indians.

Whereas the Altamonte Water Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, proposes to erect certain dams across the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers in said State, for the purpose of creating a reservoir to furnish water and power for the city of Duluth and other places, and to increase the navigability of said streams, and said company has obtained the permission of the Secretary of War of the United States, pursuant to the statutes in such cases made and provided, to erect said dams; and

Whereas the construction of one of said dams across the St. Louis River, as proposed, will flood certain lands of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation, and will necessitate the removal of the tracks of the Duluth and Winnipeg Railway Company for a long distance along the said river, and the consent of the Indians thereto has been duly obtained in open council: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said Altamonte Water Company, pursuant to authority granted by the Secretary of War to erect a dam across the St. Louis River above the town of Cloquet, Minn., is hereby authorized to take and use for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other purpose, such lands of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation in said State of Minnesota adjacent to said St. Louis River as shall be overflowed and which shall be necessary in the construction and maintenance of said dam, according to the permission granted by said Secretary of War. And in lieu of the lands now occupied and belonging to the said Duluth and Winnipeg Railway Company in said reservation which will be overflowed by reason of the construction of said dam, said railway company is hereby authorized to take other lands in said reservation which shall be necessary for a new right of way and connection with the Duluth, Missabe and Northern Railroad and depot grounds; said right of way to be 100 feet in width and not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 8,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of two stations within the limits of said reservation: Provided, That the remains of those buried in the Indian burying ground above the town of Cloquet, near the St. Louis River, shall be disinterred and reburied in a new burying ground to be selected by the Fond du Lac Indians, and inclosed by a good and substantial fence, at the expense of said water company and in accordance with the wishes and under the supervision of a committee of two Indians to be appointed in open council: And provided further, That said water company shall permit the Indians to cut and remove, free of charge, whatever timber they like from the lands purchased from them under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That nothing herein shall be construed to give said Altamonte Water Company any right to take the property of said tribe of Indians, or of any individual member thereof, or of said railway company, without first making just and full compensation therefor, and said Altamonte Water Company shall pay the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and benefit of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and of the Fond du Lac band thereof, and of the individual members of said band, just and full compensation for all lands taken and for all damages sustained by reason of the location and construction of a new line of road through the reservation.

SEC. 3. That before said dam shall be constructed, or any work done thereon, said Altamonte Water Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior an accurate sectional map, on a scale not less than 2 inches to the mile, under the corporate seal of the company and duly sworn to by the chief engineer respecting the accuracy, and certified to by the Secretary, showing the sections and parts of sections of land that will be overflowed on said reservation by reason of the construction of said dam as permitted by the Secretary of War, said line of overflow to be accurately traced by a line on said map; and the settlement of damages as herein provided for overflowed land shall be based upon said map, after its approval by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the assessment and collection of damages for other lands that may actually be overflowed which are not represented on said map as overflowed lands. For all of which land the Secretary of the Interior shall, upon payment, issue to said Altamonte Water Company and to said Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company letters patent.

SEC. 4. That the amount of damages resulting to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and to the Fond du Lac tribe of Indians, in their tribal capacity, and to the individual members of said tribe by reason of the construction of said dam and of the location and construction of said new line of railway through the reservation and through the allotments of the individual Indians, shall be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and shall be subject to his final approval; but no right of any kind shall vest in said Altamonte Water Company in or to any part of the lands mentioned herein until said map showing the lands that will be overflowed shall be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and until all the damages resulting from the construction of said dam and the location and construction of said new line of railroad through the reservation shall have been ascertained and paid; and no right of any kind shall vest in said railway company in or to any part of the new right of way herein provided for until plans thereof, made upon actual survey, for the definite location of such new line of road, including the grounds for station purposes, shall have been filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Said railroad to be located, constructed, and operated with due regard to the rights of the Indians and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe. Said water company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservation for the purpose of surveying and locating said line marking the overflowed land immediately after the passage of this act; and said railway company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservation for the purpose of surveying and locating its new line of road immediately after the approval of the map required to be filed by said water company.

SEC. 5. That the rights herein granted said water company shall be forfeited unless said dam shall be constructed within three years after the passage of this act; and the rights herein granted said railway company shall be forfeited unless the road through the reservation shall be constructed within the same time: Provided, That the time, if any, lost by unavoidable delays occasioned by strikes, injunction suits, or the act of God, shall be excluded from the operation of this section.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. LYNCH.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 165, noes 15.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] to control the fifteen minutes in favor of the proposition, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to control the fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago the Secretary of War granted permission to the Altamonte Water Company to build a dam across the St. Louis River west of Duluth for the purpose of carrying the water through a canal from that point to the city of Duluth and West Superior. So that this company has the authority now to build the dam. In order to make a reservoir large enough to carry on the project as they intended to do, the company will be obliged to flood a part of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation adjacent to the dam. About 5,000 acres of that reservation will have to be flooded. The purpose of this bill, and its sole purpose, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding, is to enable the Secretary of the Interior to sell to this company so much of the Indian reservation as may be flooded by that reservoir.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall fix a price upon the Indian lands so flooded and that this company shall pay for the lands whatever price may be so fixed, and the money must be paid before the work can proceed. The Indians are to have permission, in the first place, to take all the timber there is on the land that will be flooded and to sell it. After that this company must pay the price fixed for the land by the Secretary of the Interior before they can go any further. This bill proposes to grant authority to the Secretary of War to do just that thing and nothing more.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Who pays the people below the dam?

Mr. LYNCH. They do not come in question here at all. The giving of authority to sell the flooded part of the Indian reservation is all that we have to do with this matter. This is all bottom land along the river, probably of little or no value. The Indians have already given their consent. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has approved the bill, and in fact he drew it. The Committee on Indian Affairs heard this matter discussed for six or seven days.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. LYNCH. I will yield for a short question.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether there is any provision in this bill to protect the rights of the people who reside just below where this dam is to be constructed.

Mr. LYNCH. I will say to the gentleman that the specifications for the dam have been drawn up by the War Department with all the precautions which the Department has deemed necessary, and the dam will be built under the direction of one of the engineers of that Department. I assume that the Department will not allow any dam to be built in such a way as to endanger the lives or property of residents below the dam.

Mr. BAILEY. My information is that if this dam should give way the homes of the large number of people residing below it would be destroyed and their lives endangered. This danger would very materially affect the value of all property situated just below the dam, and I think they ought to be entitled to recover damages.

Mr. LYNCH. I assume that that matter would be governed entirely by the laws of Minnesota.

Mr. BAILEY. But this company would plead the act of Congress.

Mr. LYNCH. We are not giving them any authority of Congress for the construction of this dam. They have that authority now under the action of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BAILEY. Then this company has, in the first place, special authority for the construction of this dam, and now an act of Congress proposes to authorize the company to obtain these lands. In other words, the Secretary of War gives the power and Congress sanctions it.

Mr. LYNCH. We do not sanction it; this bill does not sanction it.

Mr. HAUGEN. My colleague [Mr. LYNCH] will allow me to say that all questions of damages which might arise would be relegated for settlement to the State courts acting under the laws of Minnesota.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not sure but that this company could plead the authority of the United States for what they had done. I think the bill ought to provide, as many of the State constitutions provide in similar cases, that whatever damages may result to adjacent owners shall be compensated by the company which constructs the dam.

Mr. HUNTER. That would be done at any rate.

Mr. LYNCH. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] has stated to the House that the private corporation interested in the passage of this bill comes here with the authority of the State of Minnesota to construct the proposed dam. I desire to say that I have here copies of all the papers which were submitted to the Secretary of War on which the permit to build these dams was granted, and they show that this company has not applied to the legislature of the State of Minnesota to obtain the right to dam the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers, and there is no general law of the State giving them that right. These rivers are wholly within the State of Minnesota, with the exception of about 20 miles from Fond du Lac down to the mouth of the St. Louis River, and for that distance the St. Louis River forms the boundary line between Minnesota and Wisconsin. This company is a private corporation created under the general law of our State for a private purpose. Its incorporators are just five persons, four of whom reside in Chicago and one in Minnesota.

I wish to call attention to one section of the law of that State under which this company is incorporated to show to the members of this House how careful the legislature of Minnesota has been to prevent the obstruction of these rivers and to preserve them in their natural condition for the benefit of the commerce which, in the form of loose logs, is floated down those rivers every year.

Section 2633 of Kelley's Statutes of Minnesota provides:

Any corporation formed under this title—

And I want to say that this is a provision of the law under which this company is incorporated, and is cited in these papers submitted to the Secretary of War as its authority for the building of these dams and on which they based their application for the Federal permit to build the same—

Any corporation formed under this title in whole or in part for the improvement of any stream and driving logs therein, or for holding or handling logs therein which shall have taken prior possession of such stream, or any considerable portion thereof, upon which portion no other person or corporation has erected any dams or other improvements and which may have need of improvement for that purpose, shall have power to improve such stream and its tributaries by clearing and straightening the channels thereof, closing sloughs, erecting sluiceways, booms of all kinds, side-rolling sluicing and flooding dams, or otherwise if necessary—

But not to build a dam a hundred feet high—but shall in no case, in any manner, materially obstruct or impede navigation upon such stream, or erect any dam or other obstruction below the head of steamboat navigation.

To this act there is the following proviso:

Provided, That all dams and other works erected under the authority given by this act shall be so constructed, used, and operated, as to facilitate and expedite the driving and handling of logs and lumber upon the stream upon which the same may be erected, and the corporation making such improvement hereunder shall have no right to stop logs destined for points below its works on said stream except where dams have been constructed to accumulate water for sluicing logs and flushing the river below the same, and in such case shall not detain logs in any part of the river so as to form a jam, or prevent the prompt delivery of logs destined for points below the works constructed under authority of this act.

That is in the act under which this company is incorporated, and how they can hope to construct a dam 100 feet high,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles long, holding 80 feet of water which will extend back from the dam a distance of 60 miles, and comply with the provisions of the law under which the company is incorporated is something that no man can possibly explain. I say, therefore, that they have no authority from the State of Minnesota for the construction of the dams proposed in this bill.

I notice from the papers here that they do not propose to have a sluiceway in this dam through which the millions of feet of lumber and logs on these streams could pass without delay. But they propose to build a by-pass a half mile up from the dam through which they hope to be able to transport these logs to the mills or to market. Any man acquainted at all with the logging and lumbering business knows that this is wholly impracticable; that this could not be done without maintaining a boom, and that in a body of water 80 feet deep and two or three miles wide a boom could not be constructed nor maintained. The proposed dam will therefore entirely destroy the lumbering business on these rivers.

But the gentleman who has just addressed the House says that the sole and only object of the bill is to give to the Altamonte Water Company the power and right, in the construction of this dam, to overflow certain lands in the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation. If gentlemen will take the time to read the bill carefully they will see that the statement is entirely erroneous. The title of the bill itself is, "To authorize the construction of certain dams across the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers, in the State of Montana, and for other purposes," and in the body of the bill it is expressly provided that—

Said Altamonte Water Company, pursuant to authority granted by the Secretary of War to erect a dam across the St. Louis River above the town of Cloquet, Minn., is hereby authorized, etc.

This expressly recognizes and confirms the act of the Secretary of War and could be pleaded in any court as an authority granted by Congress for the building of these dams. Then, again, you will see, in speaking of these lands, that it refers to—

Such lands as shall be overflowed and which shall be necessary in the construction and maintenance of said dam, according to the permission granted by the Secretary of War.

Why the mere right to overflow these lands would by implication allow the erection of a dam for that purpose. The primary object of the bill is to ratify and confirm the unauthorized interference by the Secretary of War with the rights of the State of Minnesota to govern, control, and regulate these two rivers, which lie almost wholly within our State, and which are not navigable waters, as that term is used in the Constitution of the United States, but which are, under the laws of Minnesota, public highways of that State. The Secretary of War very wisely, in the second permit granted, took occasion to say:

That it is understood that the United States shall not be liable for damages by overflow or otherwise, and makes no guarantee whatever as to the stability of the dam.

That is a wise precaution and one that was not taken in the first permit, which was obtained in February, 1894.

Permit me to say in passing that this permit was granted since this bill was reported to the House. The permit allows this company to erect a dam anywhere within certain limits, while the former permits specified the exact place for the building of these dams. Under the last permit granted by the War Department it is proposed to confer upon this private corporation not only right to obstruct these rivers, but to obstruct them at any point it may select within certain specified limits.

In regard to the authority of the Secretary of War to authorize the building of these dams I want to call attention to a letter written by Brig. Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, Chief of the Engineer Department:

In my opinion there is no objection, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned—

He might well have said that, because there is no navigation on either of those rivers, except the floating of loose logs—to the construction of the dams on the conditions named by Major Sears, but I know of no law empowering the Secretary of War to authorize the building and maintenance of dams across navigable rivers. If this application is made under section 3 of the act of Congress of July 13, 1892, it should be noted that the St. Louis River is a navigable water not wholly within the limits of a single State, and consequently does not come within the purview of that section. A franchise for the purpose in question should be obtained from Congress.

Under the cover of claiming to simply ask for the right to overflow the land in that Indian reservation they come in here and seek to ratify and confirm by Congressional enactment the authority of the Secretary of War for the building of these three dams in that State.

I want to call attention to just one further fact, Mr. Speaker. Immediately below this dam, in the town of Cloquet, reside 5,000 people. Their only means of support, and the principal business of the place, is that of lumbering. There are five sawmills and three planing mills, which maintain that town. Think, Mr. Speaker, of the constant menace to the lives and the property of those people, living right there under the breast of that dam, holding a body of water 80 feet deep and 60 miles long, in a climate the most severe, I might say, of any in the United States. That of itself ought to cause the members of this House to hesitate before voting in favor of a proposition of this kind, and to look for some other means of utilizing this magnificent water power, one that will not put in jeopardy the lives and property of 5,000 people who happen to live immediately below this proposed dam, and 20,000 people who live along the banks of that river, between there and the cities of Duluth and Superior. I think that of itself ought to have great weight with the members of this House, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that no man will vote in favor of putting those people in a position where he would not voluntarily place himself, nor permit any others to place him, or the members of his family.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been pretty thoroughly discussed before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it has also been discussed before the Committee on Rules of the House. Besides that, there has been a strong lobby here, both for and against it, for some time, so that nearly every member of this House has, I believe, received some information from some source or another in regard to this bill. I can say for myself that I reserved an opinion on this subject until I had investigated it thoroughly; and I believe now that it possesses substantial merits and that the bill ought to pass.

Besides its inherent merits, such investigation as I have been able to make convinces me that only a very small fraction of the people at the head of Lake Superior—the people directly interested—is opposed to it. The Altamonte Water Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota, and is liable under those laws for any damage it may inflict on other corporations or on individuals. It comes here for one purpose only, to secure the right to flood certain lands of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation.

As far as the direct influence of our action to-day is concerned, it does not reach beyond the district of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN] and the district which I have the honor to represent; and the people in those two districts, in the communities directly affected by this vast enterprise, if it is carried out, are almost to a man in favor of this bill. Now, where does the opposition come from?

Mr. KEM. Are there any residents of the town of Cloquet who are in favor of the passage of this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. I was going to speak of the town of Cloquet. The town of Cloquet is the town which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] told us is located below the proposed dam and the inhabitants of which are almost exclusively engaged in lumbering. It exists almost entirely because of certain large lumbering institutions which are carrying on their business at that point. But this dam, if built, will not destroy the town of Cloquet. If built it will be built under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and I take it for granted that no dam will be permitted to be built at this place that will not be absolutely safe.

Gentlemen are reminded in the pamphlets which have been sent to them of the disaster at Johnstown. People living in the narrow valleys of Pennsylvania might suffer from such a disaster as that, but it is absolutely impossible that that disaster can be repeated at this place.

At Johnstown the dam was washed away by the water flowing over the top of it.

If this structure is built according to the plans submitted no such accident can occur to the people of Cloquet. There was no supervision on the part of the public in the construction of the Johnstown dam, while here no step can be taken without the sanction and approval of an engineer of the War Department, who will see that all the conditions are complied with.

The dam as proposed to be constructed will be 700 feet wide at the bottom, coming up by a gradual slope to the top; and the dam will have a superstructure 25 feet high above the level of the water. Before the water can rise 10 feet in the dam it will overflow the divide and run into the waters of the Mississippi, giving absolute security against any such disaster as that of the Johnstown flood. It can not get within 10 feet of the top of the dam.

Where does this opposition come from? It comes from people living outside of the district represented by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN] or the district which I represent. It comes largely from the lumbermen at Cloquet and others owning pine on the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers. If they suffer from the overflow caused by this dam they have their remedy in the courts of Minnesota. This bill does not interfere with their rights. It proposes to do only one thing, as stated by my colleague.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have not I a right as a Representative to protest against the Federal Government interfering in a matter of this kind without first having the action of the legislature of my State?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not dispute your right to criticize the bill or oppose it, but I have a right to make my statement. I say that these lumber companies, if their lands are overflowed to their injury, can recover damages under the laws of Minnesota. The law the gentleman quoted seemed to relate to booming of logs rather than to the subject of overflowing lands by dams. If any lands of private individuals or corporations are overflowed by reason of this dam there is nothing in this bill to interfere with the rights of the parties to recover in the State courts, and this company is incorporated under the laws of the State of Minnesota. All it asks of us is the right to flood this Indian reservation. All other controversies must be settled in the State courts.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Is not the liability for damages limited to $50,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand the capital stock is $50,000. The parties who are forwarding this enterprise must, to start with, pay $50,000 or $100,000 or whatever damages may be found to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the Indians owning the reservation. Those damages must be settled first, before the work can proceed, and such an investment as that will be a better guaranty of good faith than any sum named as capital stock in the articles of incorporation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who is to pay the damages that will be done to the property at the town of Cloquet?

Mr. HAUGEN. They will not suffer any damage. The logging interests will be taken care of by ample chutes, and the Secretary of War will see that the dam is so constructed that the residents below will be in no jeopardy. There is property that will be injuriously affected, I dare say, by the construction of this dam, and the parties representing it are here protesting. But no great enterprise like this is undertaken anywhere without some opposition of that character, and that argument would prevent the building of any dam anywhere. It is proposed by this bill to bring the waters of the St. Louis River from the town of Cloquet to the brow of the hill at Duluth, and at an elevation of over 600 feet above the level of Lake Superior, and thus create 600,000 horsepower, and give facilities at the head of Lake Superior for the greatest manufacturing establishments in the Northwest.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to have time to answer the gentleman. I will ask my colleague to give me a little more time.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield further to my colleague to answer the question.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly or not. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the only two districts in which the people would be directly interested were the people of his district and the people of the district represented by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN]?

Mr. HAUGEN. I did say that.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. And that the people of those two districts are overwhelmingly for this proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. They are overwhelmingly for it. I would like to make one other statement. The Jay Cooke interests, so called, are the owners of property lying along that part of the St. Louis River known as the "Dells." They have not improved it. Their property has gone up in value through the general development and growth of the communities at the head of the lake, not by reason of anything that the Jay Cooke Company has done, but through the expenditure of money and efforts of others. Much of this opposition comes, I believe, from that source, but that ought not to block the way of men who propose to do something at once for the benefit of the community. The Jay Cooke interests have waited too long for others to give value to their property in order that they may reap the fruits of the toil of others and enjoy the "unearned increment."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has four minutes remaining.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. KIEFER].

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a petition signed by the people who are directly interested in this matter before this House. Here is a petition signed by the citizens and residents of the village of Cloquet, a place of 4,000 people in the county of Carlton and State of Minnesota, petitioning and remonstrating against the passage of this bill.

Here is also a petition, a protest, from a number of the citizens of the same neighborhood. I have also letters from gentlemen who are thoroughly posted on the whole matter which I will print as part of my remarks.

CLOQUET MINN., January 4, 1896.

To the Members of the House of Representatives,
United States of America:

We, the undersigned citizens and residents of the village of Cloquet (of 4,000 people), in the county of Carlton and State of Minnesota, do most earnestly petition and remonstrate against the passage of H. R. 7956, known as the Altamonte Dam bill.

The passage of this bill would be very prejudicial to and possibly destructive of our interests here. It would also, under certain contingencies, result in destruction of the lives of a large number of people.

The bill referred to, although it purports only to allow the Altamonte Water Company to purchase certain lands from the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation, is in reality an attempt to obtain the monopoly of the waters of the St. Louis River. A careful examination of the bill will show that it would operate as a Congressional adoption and recognition of a so-called scheme of improvement contemplated by the Altamonte Water Company, and by the permit of the Secretary of War, and would result in encumbering the stream in such manner as might be highly prejudicial and perhaps fatal to any other improvement enterprise.

In May, 1894, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Duluth, having this bill under consideration, adopted a report condemning the scheme on the grounds above mentioned and upon other grounds detailed at length in said report. The people of Cloquet, in addition to the objections urged by the Duluth Chamber of Commerce, have more pressing reasons for earnestly opposing the so-called Altamonte scheme, in the fact that the village of Cloquet, with nearly 4,000 inhabitants, is located less than a mile below the proposed dam of the Altamonte Water Company. This dam, which is to be 80 feet high, holding back in an artificial lake a body of water 60 miles in length and from 1 to 3 miles wide, would be a frightful menace to our lives and property. This fact is aggravated by the additional fact that so far as developed the Altamonte Water Company has no financial backing or standing and we have no assurance that even the material damage which we would suffer would be reimbursed.

We further wish to call the attention of the members of the House of Representatives to the fact that the permit of the Secretary of War was granted without our having any knowledge of such an action being contemplated. We are satisfied that we could have shown to the Secretary of War if we had had the opportunity that the statement of conditions upon which the permit was granted was erroneous and false, and that the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers, at the points covered by the permit, are in no sense navigable waters of the United States, and that even if they were the so-called improvements of the Altamonte Water Company would be obstructive to navigation, instead of helpful.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

PROTEST.

We, the undersigned citizens of Cloquet, Minn., hereby protest against the passage of House bill No. 7956 granting to the Altamonte Water Company the right to dam the St. Louis and Cloquet rivers. We deem the scheme proposed by that company detrimental to commerce and destructive to other more important interests, and to be in itself impracticable and dangerous.

OFFICE OF DULUTH AND WINNIPEG RAILROAD COMPANY,
Marquette, Mich., December 1, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of November 30 in relation to Altamonte Water Power Company received. This whole scheme has looked to me from the start as one of the most absurd that I ever knew of.

I went to Cloquet with Mr. Jannison, Lieutenant Mercer, Indian agent, and our chief engineer last winter and looked the ground over. I had a talk with Mr. Jannison on the subject and asked him if he was a lawyer and if he understood that he could carry on this scheme without the consent of the Duluth and Winnipeg Railway Company. He replied, "Oh, no; that of course we must get first." It was not my business to tell him that he could never get that, but if he had asked me I would have told him that we would never consent to the changing of our line from where it is now to the top of the hill. We have a low-grade road from Cloquet west, and no amount of money that any water company could give us would pay us to lose and take a high-grade road. Aside from that, we think our line along the line of the St. Louis River is more valuable, and will be in the future, than it could possibly be back from the river.

In short, I can only repeat that we will never consent; money is no object. We have not paid much attention to it, because we did not think it worth while, knowing that they could not do this without first getting our consent.

Yours, truly,

WM. FITCH, Receiver.

Mr. C. N. NELSON,
President Nelson Lumber Company, Cloquet, Minn.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., December 10, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to my views of the Altamonte Canal Company's scheme for developing a water power at Duluth, I would say that I have made some investigation into their plan, and do not arrive at the same conclusion as the Altamonte Company regarding its feasibility. In at least four material points I am obliged to dissent from the estimated figures of the company. It was claimed by Col. E. C. Gridley, in his remarks before the Minneapolis Commercial Club:

1. That 500,000 horsepower can be developed at Duluth under a head of 625 feet, and that, too, after receiving twice the average minimum amount of water in the river.

2. That the reservoir produced by a 30-foot dam at Cloquet will back the water to a point only 4½ miles distant from the Mississippi River, and will thus constitute a continuous waterway from the top of the hill at Duluth to a point so near the Mississippi.

3. That, allowing two and a half million dollars for the cost of improvements, including the dam, canal, land, damages to riparian rights, and power plant, the power could and would be sold at a yearly rental of $10 per horsepower.

Regarding these estimates and claims, my opinion, based on the facts and authorities which are mentioned to support them, is as follows:

1. The total amount of power that can be developed at Duluth under a 600-foot head (which is all that can be possibly obtained), using all the water in the river at ordinary low state, is 96,377 horsepower. Of this, at an efficiency of 75 per cent, there would be an available power of 72,282 horsepower. In computing this I take the area of watershed at 3,500 square miles, the rainfall at 30 inches annually, the minimum volume of water in the river at about 20 per cent of the rainfall of four-tenths of a cubic foot for each square mile of watershed.

Bearing on this very point, I find the estimate of James L. Greenleaf in the seventeenth volume of the Tenth Census of the United States. He gives the average rainfall on the St. Louis River basin as 30 inches, the average flow per square mile of drainage area in ordinary low water as four-tenths of a cubic foot, and makes the following succinct statement:

"The drainage area tributary to the river above Knife Fall is 2,326 square miles; the estimated ordinary low-water flow, 1,170 cubic feet per second, and the resulting theoretical power, under 10 feet head, 1,323 horsepower. This would make the total power with the 154 feet head (from Cloquet to Thomson) 20,451 horsepower. Under 600 feet head this would amount to 79,680 theoretical horsepower, and with an efficiency of 75 per cent would leave 69,760 horsepower available."

In order to be on the safe side I have figured the watershed at 3,500 square miles, instead of 2,926 as given by Greenleaf. This accounts for the difference in our estimates.

2. If twice the minimum flow is allowed to pass through the regular channel from Cloquet to Lake Superior the power that can be developed theoretically at Duluth with the water that is left over will not exceed 30,000 horsepower, or 22,500 horsepower at an efficiency of 75 per cent. This statement is based on an average low-water flow of 1,400 cubic feet per second (Greenleaf puts it at 1,170), and an average flow the year round of 3,200 cubic feet per second. It does not take into account the loss of water by leakage, by greater evaporation from the reservoir, nor by locking vessels through at each end at Cloquet, as proposed.

3. The gap between the proposed reservoir and the Mississippi River will be several times greater than 4½ miles. It is only at the highest state of water in the reservoir that the water is supposed to back up so near the Mississippi. As the water in the reservoir is lowered by using in time of low water the distance between its outer margin and the Mississippi will rapidly increase, that being the shallowest of the reservoir. Consequently a canal connecting the Altamonte reservoir and the Mississippi River will not be appreciably shortened by the construction of a dam at Cloquet from which the water is to be used in the summer season.

4. It is unreasonable to expect to find a market within the next decade; and simply preposterous to talk about selling 100,000 horsepower there. According to the Tenth Census report and other authorities, the power, both steam and water power, used in the United States amounts to 1 horsepower for about every 12 of our inhabitants, and in cities may run as high as 1 horsepower to every six or eight of the population. If there are 150,000 people in Duluth and vicinity there may be used at present 20,000 or 25,000 horsepower. It would be impossible to supplant all this power by electric power or by water power, no matter how cheaply it is offered. But even this estimate is probably too high for the power used in the neighborhood of Duluth, for according to the Census report, the entire State of Minnesota only used 53,580 horsepower of all kinds in 1880, which was an increase of 167 per cent over that used in 1870. A proportionate increase since the Tenth Census would give 131,868 horsepower as the amount of steam power and water power used in Minnesota in 1894. Of this Duluth, with 2½ per cent of the population of the State, can hardly use more than 5 per cent of the power of 6,550 horsepower. Allowing the same liberal amount for West Superior and adjacent towns, and we have 13,000 horsepower used at the head of Lake Superior. And, as before stated, only a portion of this power could be diverted into the new scheme to make use of its power.

5. With only 22,500 horsepower available at Duluth, and, as admitted by their own representatives, an initial cost of construction of $2,500,000, it is self-evident that the power can not be sold for $10 per horsepower per annum. That would not pay the requisite interest on the investment, to say nothing of depreciation, repairs, or cost of operation.

Other statements made by agents or representatives of the Altamonte Canal Company do not bear investigation any better than the foregoing. But I have probably said enough to convince you that their scheme is visionary and even chimerical, and can not be carried to any kind of successful termination.

Yours very truly,

Mr. C. N. NELSON, Cloquet, Minn.

HORACE V. WINCHELL.

During the reading of the above petition the time of Mr. KIEFER expired, and, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. I merely wish to emphasize the question which I propounded a few moments ago to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH]. My objection to this bill is that it sanctions the construction of a dam immediately above a town containing something like four or five thousand people; and it makes no provision for compensating those people for whatever damage their property may suffer in consequence of the construction of this dam. If they should institute a suit against the company constructing the dam in the courts of Minnesota the company would file in the Federal court a petition for the removal of the cause, alleging that they had a defense arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. They would thus carry their case into the Federal courts, and there they would plead that if those people below the dam had suffered any injury to their property it was an injury for which they could not obtain compensation, because under the Federal Constitution persons can not recover for damages to their property; they can only recover the value of property which is actually taken.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to see this bill safeguarded in this respect. Most of the States which have in late years adopted constitutions have acted upon the theory that it is as indefensible to damage a citizen's property without compensation as it is to take it, and they have enlarged the prohibition so that where the Federal Constitution and all of the early State constitutions only prohibited the taking, it is now provided that private property shall not be "taken, damaged, or destroyed without just compensation." I simply ask that the present bill shall conform to this requirement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN].

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, the principal objection to this measure comes from the lumber ring of Minnesota and Wisconsin. They claim that this dam is a menace to their property at Cloquet and to the lives of individuals living in the village. That is a mere pretext. This lumber company owns and controls a boom monopoly granted it by the legislature of Minnesota some twenty years ago—a monopoly of that river for booming and logging purposes. That is where the opposition comes from. For twenty years we of Duluth and that section of country have been trying in the legislature to break or modify that monopoly. But so powerful has been that interest in money and legislative influence that we have not succeeded. If this project is carried out we deprive that monopoly of none of its privileges with respect to running logs on that stream, but we permit every other lumberman to run logs there.

As to the legal points which have been raised by gentlemen in opposition to this measure, if they are sound, then the courts will sustain them, and the Altamonte Company can never lay a stick of lumber or put down a stone in the construction of that dam.

The opposition to this bill from all quarters originates with monopolies and is vicious. The Jay Cooke monopoly, which controls the dalles of the St. Louis below the site of this proposed dam, has held that property for twenty years—acting the part of the dog in the manger, refusing to develop it themselves and preventing anybody else from doing so—putting a fictitious value of a million dollars upon their franchise.

Now, the people of Duluth and Superior, aggregating a population of 100,000, are unanimous in favor of this legislation. It means more to them than all the other factors combined in the development and upbuilding of those two great cities. I held this measure here in committee for three months until I could satisfy myself regarding the Altamonte Company and its financial ability, and also with regard to the wishes of my constituency. When satisfied beyond any doubt that the measure had their unanimous approval I gave it my support. I appeal to members of this House to vote for as just and as righteous a measure as ever was presented to this Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNCH] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 90, noes 68.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds have not voted in favor of the motion.

Mr. BALDWIN and others. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LYNCH and Mr. TAWNEY were appointed tellers.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 90, answered "present" 2, not voting 125; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 18, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have forwarded to the governor of the State of Washington my resignation as a member of the House of Representatives from that State at large, to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully,

JOHN L. WILSON.

HON. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker House of Representatives.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. STOCKDALE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. TURNER of Virginia, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOLMAN, for this day, on account of sickness in his family.

COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. MARTIN of Indiana, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was granted leave to sit continuously during the session of the House to-morrow.

CONDITION OF BUSINESS, GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. DOCKERY, from the Joint Commission of Congress on the Status of the Executive Departments, etc., submitted a report on the condition of business in the Departments of the Government in Washington; which was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 5624) to authorize the Oklahoma Central Railroad to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. BLANCHARD as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3476) to provide for the examination and classification of certain mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8272) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to Harrison C. Hobart, brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. VILAS, Mr. PALMER, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Wessels.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 252) relative to the British Guiana-Venezuela boundary dispute;

A bill (H. R. 4953) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (S. 2589) granting cannon to the Historical Museum, Des Moines, Iowa.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

The following report of committee was handed in at the Clerk's desk, referred to its appropriate calendar, and otherwise disposed of as indicated below.

PUBLIC BUILDING, PARIS, KY.

Mr. BERRY (on the 16th of February), from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported the bill (S. 2576) for the erection of a public building at Paris, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL MESSENGERS, CLERK'S OFFICE.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk in connection with the business of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and empowered to employ for the remainder of the session two bicycle messengers for day and night service between the enrolling room of the Clerk's office and the Government Printing Office, to be paid each out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, at $5 per day.

Mr. REED. What is the object of this resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Clerk of the House needs a couple of messengers between the enrolling room and the Government Printing Office during the last few days of the session in order to expedite the engrossing and enrollment of bills.

Mr. REED. This is only for a few days.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Only for the remainder of the session.

Mr. HITT. Has the price of labor gone up so that these messengers must receive $5 a day each?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That also includes the bicycle.

Mr. HITT. That means a rental of $3 or $4 a day for the bicycle. Men are begging for work now at $1 per day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The service is needed, and I ask a vote upon the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MEXICAN FREE ZONE.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Ways and Means, a bill of a local character.

I am directed by the committee to report a joint resolution (H. Res. 277) in reference to the free zone along the northern frontier of Mexico and adjacent to the United States.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS, ALASKA.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, from the Committee on Ways and Means, by unanimous consent, reported in lieu of the bill H. R. 8683 a bill (H. R. 8909) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and for other purposes," which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent all general debate on the bill is closed, and the Clerk will now report the bill by paragraphs for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

For the pay of officers on sea duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; general storekeepers; receiving ships and other vessels; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineer's force and for the Coast Survey Service and Fish Commission, 8,250 men and 750 boys, at the pay prescribed by law; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist as many additional seamen as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 2,000; in all, $7,824,329: Provided, That hereafter no officer of the Navy shall be deprived of sea-duty pay while attached to a vessel in commission by reason of assignment to duty as a member of a naval court-martial, court of inquiry or board, or to other temporary duty, or by reason of being sent to a naval hospital for temporary treatment.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to raise a point of order upon all after the word "law," in line 6, down to and including the word "thousand," in line 8, on page 2.

I have another point of order, but will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Texas that if any debate should take place on the balance of the paragraph, it would be too late for him to make the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. SAYERS. Then, Mr. Chairman, in addition, I will also reserve a point of order upon the words "eight thousand two hundred and fifty men, and seven hundred and fifty boys," in lines 4 and 5 of the same page; and also, commencing with the word "provided," in line 10, down to and including line 15 of said page.

The points of order are that the language named is new legislation, and that it does not decrease, but it does increase expenditures.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many men are now authorized?

Mr. SAYERS. Nine thousand only.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. For the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I think the point of order should be settled now.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I understood the point of order was reserved. Of course my amendment is not in order until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, referring to the point of order which covers parts of lines 4 and 5 of page 2 of the bill, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the existing law. The naval appropriation act approved March 3, 1893, reads as follows:

And the number of persons who may at one time be enlisted in the Navy of the United States, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, mechanics, firemen, and coal heavers, and including 1,500 apprentices and boys, hereby authorized to be enlisted annually, shall not exceed 9,000.

Now, the paragraph to which I except, instead of reciting the pay of 7,500 men and 1,500 boys, provides for 8,250 men and 750 boys.

This is all I have to say in reference to the particular portion of the clause.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Maryland begins the Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that it has been repeatedly held in this House by Speaker Carlisle; by Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole; by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, that it would be competent for the Committee of the Whole to accept an amendment authorizing the construction of new ships; that the provision of the rule that refers to works and objects already in progress would amply cover that.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, one moment. There is no statute which limits the number of vessels in the Navy, but there is a statute, however, which limits the number of men and boys in the Navy—that is, to 9,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the law authorizing the construction of certain vessels is as much a limitation on the number of vessels as if they were specified by number.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the point that I wish to make is that in the case suggested by the Chair there was no limit fixed by law; but in the matter of seamen and boys a limit is fixed by law. The law especially says that the number of men and the number of boys shall be 9,000, and no more. The Committee on Naval Affairs violate the law in this bill and also change the number of men and the number of boys.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Is not the law my friend refers to the current appropriation bill, from year to year?

Mr. SAYERS. No; it is not simply current law.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Whether it is or not, under authority of Congress we have in course of construction the Iowa, Indiana, Massachusetts, Oregon, Maine, Texas, Brooklyn, Puritan, Amphitrite, Terror, Monadnock, the Olympia just finished, and the Marblehead, and three gunboats.

Now, under the ruling, first, of Mr. Wellborn, of Texas, in the Forty-eighth Congress, the ruling of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] in the Forty-ninth Congress, and other similar rulings, it has been held that this is nothing in the world but a continuation of public work.

Mr. SAYERS. This is not a continuation of public work.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. If it is not, I should like to know what constitutes a continuation of public work.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas inform the Chair how it would be possible to continue these vessels unless you have men to man them?

Mr. SAYERS. It is for Congress to say whether the vessels shall be put in commission or not. Now, I would ask the Chair, unless the mind of the Chair is fully settled upon the proposition, to withhold his ruling upon these points until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to do that if there be no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. I will call the attention of the Chair to lines 6, 7, and 8:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist as many additional seamen as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 2,000.

The naval appropriation bill approved March 3, 1893, provides that the number of persons who may at any one time be enlisted in the naval force of the United States, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, mechanics, firemen, coal heavers, and 1,500 apprentices, shall not exceed 2,000. This number is fixed by law. The proposition is to increase that number by 2,000.

This is the existing law. It defines the number of men and boys of all kinds of which the Navy shall consist. The statute is mandatory in requiring that it shall not exceed 9,000. There can be no misunderstanding upon this point. The decisions to which the Chair has referred have reference only to the building of ships; and, if I mistake not, the ground upon which these decisions rested was that it was but a continuation of public works in progress. I would like the Chair to examine the debates carefully upon those points of order. It will be going very far indeed to say that the enlistment of men and boys is for the purpose of carrying on public works in course of construction. This is the first attempt that has been made to increase the personal strength of the Navy by a clause upon an appropriation bill. If the Chair will refer to the proceedings of the House he will find for the last two Congresses, probably three Congresses, the effort to increase the personal strength of the Navy has been undertaken on separate bills.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this point of order will be determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer that the matter should go over.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Of course I do not want to force the Chair to make his decision, but I do want the Chair to follow out this ruling made by previous Chairmen, and made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] last year with reference to "continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." I simply desire to ask the gentleman from Texas, what in the world is the use of the Committee on Naval Affairs appropriating money to construct ships if we are not to provide additional seamen? That is a continuation of a public work and object. We have just as much right to report, and we could have reported from time to time, in every single bill that provided for the construction of these vessels the money to man them when completed. That could have been carried on the bill at the same time, and I dare the gentleman to find a precedent that says we can not.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman can not show a precedent of the kind.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. One minute, sir. And if we could do it then, we can do it now.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman. It is not for me to find precedents. It is for the gentleman to do so in order to sustain his position.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is important that the gentleman from Texas should find the precedent on his point of order.

Mr. WASHINGTON. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. We can not hear anything the gentleman is saying.

Mr. MONEY. Is there any limit to debate upon this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir. It is in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the Chair reserves his point of order until to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intends to withhold the decision until to-morrow on the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask how many times a gentleman can speak on a point of order. Is there any limit?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limit except the judgment of the Chair. The discussion on the point of order is for the information of the Chair.

Mr. SAYERS. I have not occupied this floor very much in talking. I have talked less than the gentleman from Mississippi—a great deal less. I will call the attention of the Chair to a proposition that is analogous. The Government of the United States is engaged in building fortifications and in the construction of military posts at various places in the country. Now, will it be contended that in order to man the fortifications and to occupy the military posts the Committee on Military Affairs would have the right in the army appropriation bill to increase the number of officers and enlisted men? It is one thing to build ships and another thing to use them. It is one thing to construct fortifications and military posts, but it is another and quite different thing to enlist men in order to man them. And so with court-houses and with post-office buildings. To sum it up, Mr. Chairman, the law is silent as to the number of ships that may be built, but it distinctly provides that the number of seamen, enlisted men, and boys shall not exceed 9,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to be heard for one or two minutes on the point of order. The question is whether this provision which has reference to manning the Navy—the personnel of the Navy—is radically different from the question of the construction of these new ships. The gentleman from Texas says that the question of arsenals and forts is entirely distinct. He is right in that proposition. But this question of the personnel of the Navy, or the manning of the Navy, is part of one grand scheme. It is a part of the same scheme of which the construction of new vessels is a part; and that is a question of the reorganization of the Navy. You can not have the construction of vessels without the necessary men, the necessary personnel, to man them.

I submit to the Chair the highest Democratic authority for this proposition, the report of Hon. William C. Whitney, when Secretary of the Navy, on the 1st of December, 1886, in which, after alluding to the then decadence of the Navy, he indicates the necessary steps for its reorganization. He takes up the question of the manning or personnel of the Navy and then goes on to consider the further question of the construction of new vessels. So I submit that these two questions form parts of one great subject, and that the point of order raised is not well taken.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. If you may, in accordance with our rules, increase upon a general appropriation bill the number of seamen and the number of apprentices, may you not also increase the number of lieutenant-commanders, commodores, or admirals?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why not? The law prescribes the number of the staff and the line, as well as the number of seamen and apprentices. It seems to me as a matter of principle and law the two cases are on "all fours."

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman from Illinois want these vessels to lie idle?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not speaking about what I want. I am speaking about the point of order. I am trying to find out what can be done under our rules if this provision is not subject to a point of order.

I will go a step farther. If you can increase the number of seamen and the number of apprentices, the law already providing what the number shall be, I ask again can you not increase the number of the staff and the line; and if you can do that, then, as the greater includes the less, can you not put your navy personnel measure on this appropriation bill and still be in order?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The answer to the gentleman is this: Anything that furthers the object of the reconstruction of the Navy, which is authorized by existing law, is in order on this appropriation bill. It is a matter for the House to determine whether it will make the proposed appropriation or enact the proposed legislation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I hope this point of order will be disposed of now. There is no propriety or expediency in postponing it or evading it. No dust can be thrown in the eyes of this House or the people by any technical discussion on this point which will for a moment prevent everybody from seeing that the success of this point of order means simply to deprive the Navy of the men who are absolutely essential to enable it to be effective.

Nothing is better known than the fact that we need more men in the Navy. Either we must have them or the ships which are already being built and put in commission must be put out of commission and tied up at the wharves, without sufficient force even to keep them in order. We have to-day vessels in commission with but half a complement of men. We have been in emergencies transferring portions of the crews from some of our ships to others, leaving some vessels with but half or third of a complement, in order that we might dispatch others upon the public business.

None of these gentlemen who raise this point of order will get up here and argue against increasing the force of the Navy. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will make no such argument as that. My friend from Illinois will not stand up here and say that he does not think we ought to have men to man these ships. No man will argue for a moment that we ought to go on completing the vessels we now have on the stocks, putting them in commission, making them available for the uses for which the people intended them and for which Congress provided them, and still have no men to man them. But we have this habitual, this everlasting appearance of the Appropriations Committee, in the person either of its chairman or some of the other mandarins of that institution, making points of order to prevent some other committee from accomplishing something in the way of public business.

Now, it has been held in this House over and over again, that no rule, no clause of a rule, no technical provision of any rule, not even rules that were made with such specific care by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who certainly has never had any superior in framing provisions to keep legislation out of appropriation bills—it has been held over and over again that none of these provisions are sufficient to exclude from the naval appropriation bill appropriations for the building of ships. The addition of new vessels has been ruled in order time and again, as being clearly a part of the purpose of appropriating for the naval establishment.

I would like to have some one tell me, if he can, what an appropriation bill, which, by its specific terms as well as by the rules of the House, is declared to be a bill appropriating the annual funds necessary to carry on the naval establishment, is intended for if it is not intended to provide for the navy-yards and to provide for manning and equipping the vessels of the Navy? If, in a bill appropriating for the naval establishment of the Government for the next fiscal year, a bill covering every legitimate expenditure attaching to the Navy Department for the twelve months of the next fiscal year, we can provide in that bill for every detail of the naval establishment for the construction of ships and for the completion of ships partly built, and if we can provide for launching ships and putting in commission ships already built and launched, it seems to me a most remarkable thing that we are there to stop absolutely and make no use whatever of the expenditure by being prevented from providing the men who are absolutely essential to utilize them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is just as much a part of the naval establishment to have men to sail the ships as it is to have the ships to sail. We have made great progress of late years, it is true, but ships are not as yet entirely automatic; we have to put men on them to manage them, and with a situation as flagrant as it is now, as notorious as it is now, as exigent as it is to-day in regard to the lack of men, it seems to me that in the closing hours of this session for this House to be stampeded or obstructed or turned aside from a manifest duty by a mere technical quibble that this is legislation upon an appropriation bill, a principle which has been recognized as legitimate and proper in dealing with all of these subjects in the past, strikes me as being an exceedingly small business.

I undertake to say that the rulings are ample and convincing on this point that this is as much a legitimate part of the business of providing for the naval establishment as any other item carried by the bill; and there is not an item in it, from the beginning to the end, that is more important. Indeed, I doubt if there is one of so much importance as this provision making appropriation for the additional number of men that we know we must have, or else there has been a waste of the public money and we have a number of new ships which we can not utilize and which are an unnecessary burden to the public service.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish to say a word, Mr. Chairman, touching the point of order, and in that if I say a word as to the merits of the proposition I will base my excuse for so doing upon the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

I do not stand here to deny for a moment but what more seamen and more apprentices are necessary in the Navy. I stop there, though. I have more respect for my honorable friend's judgment in a matter that he is charged with than he seems to have for mine—

Mr. BOUTELLE. That you are not charged with.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Touching the public business of this House concerning the Navy.

But the gentleman from Maine should remember that after all I have the honor to be a member of the House. I helped to adopt its rules, and when a question of procedure comes up it is quite proper that I should have an opinion, and proclaim it if I do have it.

Now, what is the proposition presented here? The proposition is to increase the personnel of the Navy upon the general appropriation bill; that is all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope my friend from Illinois will permit me to suggest that in making use of that word "personnel," which is now becoming somewhat chronic in this House, he will not allow any member to be confused with the idea that we are endeavoring to inject into this bill an additional official corps for the Navy.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, Mr. Chairman, it may be the official corps of the Navy ought to be changed, perhaps increased. I am not saying that it ought not to be. But I do say that the general law, wholly independent of appropriation bills, the statutory provision, the fixed law, says how many there shall be of the staff and how many of the line in the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman says the statutory law provides it. Does the gentleman not know that that was fixed in just such a clause of an appropriation bill as this?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman from Maine was a lawyer—

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ah!

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would say he was pettifogging.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, you ought to know.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. General legislation has been in years past enacted on appropriation bills, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now, will the gentleman—

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield. I would be very glad to be able to conclude at least one sentence. [Laughter.] If these bees of the Naval Committee can cease depositing their honey until I can complete a sentence I shall be very glad. [Laughter.]

The Navy exists by positive provision of law—the staff, the line, the seamen, and the apprentices. The whole establishment exists, as the gentleman from Maine must know, entirely independent of any appropriation bill.

Now, I think quite likely it ought to be changed, and ought to be increased. I am not here to antagonize that; but I do say when Rule XXI declares that no appropriation shall be in order which changes existing law that that means something.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am willing to follow the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman still can not hold his peace until I state the proposition. I do say that when the rule provides a method of procedure that the Committee of the Whole House is bound by it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Just in one minute. Let me state the proposition. Now, what is the proposition? Upon a general appropriation bill it is proposed to change existing law.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment to allow me to ask him to point out what law it is that limits the number of enlisted men in the Navy? There is a law that limits the number of men in the Army, and I should like to know if there is any law that limits the number of men in the Navy?

Mr. SAYERS. I will read the law. The act of March 3, 1893, reads as follows:

And the number of persons who may at one time be enlisted into the Navy of the United States, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, mechanics, firemen, and coal heavers, and including 1,500 apprentices and boys, hereby authorized to be enlisted annually, shall not exceed 9,000.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman from Texas produces the law. He might read further and produce the law that fixes the number of officials.

Now, the Naval Committee proposes to change existing law upon this bill. I will vote for a resolution suspending the rules and making it in order for them to report the proposed legislation. I suppose it is necessary to have it, and that it ought to be had; but nevertheless the rules, standing as they are, and the point of order being invoked by the gentleman from Texas, I insist that this provision is subject to the point of order.

Why, where will this take us to if this provision is not subject to the point of order? It would be in order for any member of this Committee of the Whole House to rise and move to double the number and salaries of the officials of the Navy. It would no more change existing law than does this provision. It would be in order to move the Navy personnel bill. It may be that is a desirable thing to do. I am not combating it. I am not opposing it, and it is with poor grace, in my judgment—and I speak respectfully—that the gentleman comes in, and when a member of this House sees proper, in the exercise of his right, to invoke the rule of the House in favor of orderly proceedings touching appropriations, to make an attack either upon that member or upon other committees.

If I was inclined to reply, I would say that it would have been far better for the Committee on Naval Affairs to mature a bill containing this proposed legislation that would stand by itself, upon its own merits, and let us consider it in the ordinary way, instead of seeking to attach it to a great money bill for the support of the Navy, under the law, and thereby to buy its way through the House, because the money bill must pass. That is all I have to say.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is, when Congress changed the law in relation to the number of ships, whether they did not change existing law independently of the appropriations, and the appropriations to build those ships simply followed as a matter of course?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this point of order I think gentlemen should be recognized alternately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. BOUTELLE. We ought not to have the whole of this discussion conducted by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am entirely willing to yield to allow the gentleman from Maine to speak.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I want to submit a question before the gentleman commences the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I want to submit a question before the gentleman begins. Under clause 3 of Rule XXI—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has waived his right and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], who has the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my distinguished and esteemed friend, seems to be laboring under one mistake. He has assumed that I and my colleagues on the committee have been advocating some infraction of the rules. On the contrary, I have been endeavoring in my usual feeble way to convey to the House the impression that I believe that we are acting exactly in accordance with the rules.

I can understand how natural it is for my friend to take the view that he does, when he thinks differently from what I do, but I understand that the naval appropriation bill, in making this provision, is proceeding entirely in accordance not only with the rules, but with the custom of this House, absolutely. I believe there would be just as much propriety and just as much force in the action of any gentleman on this floor who should get up here and make a point of order upon any clause in this bill providing for an additional 50 shells, or for half a dozen more percussion primers, or for any other little technical detail that is not exactly like what was in the former appropriation bill, and claim that it changed existing law. Of course it does, in that technical sense.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is a broader sense of the rule than mere technicality. I want to say to my distinguished friend that there are other methods of invoking the law than the methods of pettifoggery, even though he suspects me of doing so. I can understand that a broad view of the law may be taken, that the general trend and purpose of the law, the general object and the underlying principle of the rule may have something to do with its operation and be quite as useful in the body as the mere microscopical and technical use of the rules as obstructive to public business instead of facilitating public business.

I belong to a political organization that has made a point before the country for several years in upholding the principle that the rules of a parliamentary body should be construed for the purpose of accomplishing things instead of being construed for the purpose of preventing things. Now, this rule in its inception was made for the purpose of preventing things; and my friend knows it. This rule was born of that spirit which dominated the Democratic party for many years, of being absolutely distrustful not only of the people, but of Congress itself. It was born for the purpose of preventing legislation. I believe the rules ought to be construed to facilitate legislation; and if I ever had any doubt on a technical point in regard to the rule I could have no doubt in this case. I have heard, as you have, such an absolute admission on the part of my distinguished friend that the underlying purpose of the American people, the fundamental object of this bill, the desirable thing to do, the thing that we want to accomplish, and a thing which he says he will help us to accomplish, and as you know we will accomplish if he does not invoke and persist in interposing this technical point of order.

Now, it is a very simple thing. The Chair may go on trying and persuading this country that he is administering the rules of the House in the interest of public business instead of recognizing and allowing an opportunity for the presentation of every obstructive point of order that may be offered on every opportunity that arises here, or he may find that there is some slight technical differences or provisions along other minor lines; but I opine from his experience and knowledge of the precedents that the Chair will take a different view of his duty and the interest of the public business. My judgment is that any man presiding in this House, having a great appropriation bill pending, as this one is, will look at the fundamental proposition involved in it; and that he will recognize the fact that under this bill providing for the naval establishment it has been ruled time and again that not only can we provide for additional buildings at navy-yards, but also for new dry docks and may order the building of new vessels.

When we are providing for the naval establishment we can go on and do any of these proper and legitimate things which are not only essential, but necessary and desirable to promote the efficiency of that establishment. They can be provided in this bill, and that is a proper method of legislation. This measure is presented here by a committee having this particular matter in charge. It is here with the recommendation of the President of the United States and the heads of the bureaus, and it has received the indorsement and careful consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I hope, Mr. Chairman, the point of order will be overruled.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard but a moment. I have no purpose to discuss the merits of the proposition under consideration. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the few remarks I shall make upon the point of order are predicated upon the absolute confidence I have in the ability and fairness of the present occupant of the chair. We have a system of rules, whether wise or unwise, that have been adopted by the House and each member owes it to himself and the Chair owes it to the high position he holds to maintain the integrity of those rules.

Now, then, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] raises the question of order that under clause 3 of Rule XXI this provision under consideration changes existing law and increases expenditures. Clause 3 of Rule XXI authorizes a change of existing law—

Provided that such change is germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

In other words, the point of order is this: That the provision changes existing law and increases expenditures. The existing law is found in the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1893, which has been read by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I will not repeat it. That law specifically limits the number of seamen that can be enlisted in the Navy of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that that was contained in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly; and would have been subject to the point of order if the point of order had been made against it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Nobody made such a point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. The legislative appropriation bill which has just been passed by the House bristled with administrative legislative paragraphs, but the "technical point of order" referred to by the gentleman from Maine was either not invoked or else the House anticipated that the legislation would be obnoxious to points of order and directed the legislation to be incorporated in the legislative appropriation bill.

Now, the gentleman from Maine talks about "a technical point of order." I submit in all candor, Mr. Chairman, that we can not characterize any point of order other than as a "technical point of order." All points of order are technical. This point raised by the gentleman from Texas is technical; that is to say, he alleges that the provision of the bill changes existing law and increases expenditures.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. But there are exceptions to the rule, and this is one of them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to see whether this House can not rise above the level of the lawyer to that of the statesman—whether it can not override the technicality in order to reach the substance.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, no member of this House can afford to "rise" above the law; and the rules of this House are the law until repealed or modified. When the rules of the House are invoked—when a "technical point of order" is made—the Chair must maintain the integrity of the rules independently of his views as to the propriety or impropriety of the proposed legislation.

Mr. LACEY. At the time of the passage of the naval appropriation bill which has been referred to, the number of vessels had previously been provided for by separate acts. Since that time the number has been increased. Now, has not "the existing law" been already changed, and does not this provision simply carry out existing law by providing for the manning of vessels already provided for?

Mr. DOCKERY. That is in pursuance of another clause of the rule which speaks of "public objects." I think a very broad construction of the rule was adopted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] when he admitted as in order a proposition for the construction of new ships. Still, that ruling has been made and the construction of new ships allowed. But when that ruling was made the Chair was not confronted with an express provision of the statute limiting the vessels of the Navy to a certain number. Again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine has just stated that a point of order might be made on a provision for 50 percussion primers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If there is such a thing in the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. No doubt such a point of order could be made on a provision of that kind if carried in the bill, provided the statute limited the appropriation to a certain number, and the bill exceeded the number authorized. But there was no such statutory provision as to ships, and therefore the appropriation was in pursuance of a public object authorized by law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman hold for one moment that because the naval appropriation bill of one year has provided for buying 500 barrels of pork as provisions for the Navy, it would therefore be out of order to provide in the next appropriation bill for the purchase of 550 barrels?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why not?

Mr. DOCKERY. If there was a statute limiting the appropriation to 500 barrels of pork, then you could not provide for 550 if a question of order was raised.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the gentleman must bear in mind that the "statute" he talks so much about has no more force to-day than any other provision of an appropriation bill. It was a provision of a naval appropriation bill for the time being.

Mr. DOCKERY. The provision to which I refer is permanent law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No more permanent than this will be when it becomes law.

Mr. DOCKERY. Here is a provision that the number of seamen shall be limited to 9,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And this bill does the same thing.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; this bill authorizes the employment of additional seamen in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Just as the bill modifies many other provisions of previous naval appropriation bills.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, I want to address myself more especially to the Chair. I wish to call attention to a statute in respect to the police force of the District of Columbia. The Chair is familiar with that statute. He will recall the fact that when the District of Columbia appropriation bill is reported to the House each year we report in that bill provisions for the exact number of officers and privates fixed by law, because under the statute fixing their number we are not authorized to exceed that limit. But the Senate, not being hedged about by just such rules as we have here, increases the number to whatever may seem to be necessary for the interests of the public service.

Mr. BOUTELLE rose.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I submit to the Chair that this discussion has gone far enough. The Chair ought to be able to decide the point. It is too plain for discussion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to make merely one further suggestion. The gentleman from Missouri stated very explicitly that many of the other appropriation bills have carried provisions which he thinks would have been obnoxious to the point of order if such a point had been made. But no point was made; and undoubtedly my vigilant friend refrained from making it because he believed the public interests would be subserved by refraining. Now, he can serve the public interest in the same way, if he wants to satisfy his own mind and the mind of everybody else who is in trouble. Here is a provision that all want. Let him then withdraw his point of order and let us go on with the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not raise the question of order.

Mr. CHALLIVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this whole matter was settled in the decision of Governor McCREARY when Chairman of the committee in 1887. The exception provided in clause 2 of Rule XXI takes out from under the operation of the rule appropriations—

For such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Governor McCREARY, applying that rule to the construction of new ships, has declared—

That the public object involved in the building of a new ship is the maintenance of the Navy.

Now, it seems to me nobody can deny the fact that the manning of the ship is as distinctly the maintenance of the Navy as any other public function connected with it, even the construction of the ship.

The CHAIRMAN. In accordance with the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as well as of the gentleman from Texas who makes the point of order, the Chair will be pleased to have this go over until to-morrow and let the point of order be pending.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WASHINGTON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Henry D. Plummer, there being no adverse report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SAYERS. I trust the gentleman from Maryland will not do that. Twelve o'clock is early enough, in view of the fact that members have committee matters and other things to attend to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I make that motion, Mr. Speaker. The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 50, noes 47.

Mr. TRACEY and others. No quorum.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I do not want to keep the members here at this late hour, and I withdraw the motion.

Mr. REED. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. HUTCHESON, from the Committee on Claims, reported the bill (H. R. 7000) for the relief of Robert Brigham, late postmaster at Franklin, Pa.; which, with the accompanying report (No. 1847), was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7444) to increase the pension of Mary A. Wilkins; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAIN: A bill (H. R. 8905) to change the day for the first annual meeting of Congress from the first Monday in December to the first Tuesday after the 4th day of March, and to provide for a meeting of Congress to count the electoral vote for President and Vice-President and to transact no other business, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. HICKS (by request): A bill (H. R. 8906) for the relief of persons who served ninety days or more in the various construction corps attached to the United States Army on railroads operated by the military authorities of the United States from April, 1861, to June, 1865—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8907) authorizing the Secretary of War to procure medals for those who responded to and enlisted under the first call of President Lincoln for 75,000 troops to aid in the preservation of the Union—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HERMANN: A bill (H. R. 8908) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims as amended by act of Congress approved July 18, 1894—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. RUSK: A resolution to print digest of contested-election cases and to pay Alfred J. Stofer for the compilation of said digest—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. DOCKERY: A resolution of the legislature of Missouri, requesting the Missouri members of Congress to vote to foreclose mortgage on Union Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

By Mr. CRISP (by request): A memorial from the legislature of Kansas, relating to the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Kansas Volunteer Cavalry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also (by request), a memorial from the legislature of Arizona, requesting the withdrawal from public entry the lands within the "Petrified Forest"—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GRAHAM: A memorial of the joint assembly of the State of New York, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 56) classifying clerks in postal service, and bill (H. R. 6685) fixing the salaries of letter carriers—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 19, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. MARTIN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

SENATOR FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I take great pleasure in presenting the credentials of Hon. John L. Wilson, a Senator-elect from the State of Washington for the term commencing March 4, 1893. I send the credentials to the Chair and ask that they be read.

The Secretary read the credentials of John L. Wilson, chosen by the legislature of the State of Washington a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1893.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file. The Senator-elect will please come forward and receive the oath of office.

Mr. Wilson advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. VOORHEES, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1895.

SIR: The following Senate resolution has been received:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether it is necessary or desirable that legislation should be had authorizing the issuing of bonds, Treasury notes, or other securities to realize moneys for the purpose of paying current deficiencies in the revenue; and, if so, the nature and substantial details of such legislation."

In response to the inquiries contained in the resolution, I have the honor to say that the available cash balance in the Treasury at the close of business this day, exclusive of $55,101,704.63 gold reserve, is $39,573,261.32, as shown by the inclosed statement.

It is my opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be permanently invested with authority to issue and sell short-time bonds, or other obligations of the Government, for the purpose of raising money to meet such deficiencies in the ordinary revenues as may occur from time to time; but I do not think that there is any necessity at the present time for the exercise of such authority if it existed.

It is not probable that such deficiencies will occur during the remainder of the current fiscal year as will exceed the available balance now on hand, and it is estimated that during the next fiscal year the receipts will exceed the expenditures.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8264) granting a pension to Saloma Mangold was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

METROPOLITAN STREET RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 252.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 252) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 5. That the Brightwood Railway Company, the Rock Creek Railway Company, and the Georgetown and Tennytown Railroad Company be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and required to sell four coupon tickets for 25 cents, good for one continuous ride in the District of Columbia over the lines of said companies respectively and the lines of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, and the said suburban roads shall redeem the tickets collected by the Metropolitan Railroad Company at the rate of 2½ cents for each coupon ticket presented by the said Metropolitan Railroad Company. Any of the aforesaid railroad companies which shall refuse to make sale of tickets or to accept tickets so sold as herein provided for shall be liable to a fine of $50 for each such violation, to be recovered in the police court of the District of Columbia as other fines are recovered: Provided, That the proceeding for the collection of such penalty shall be commenced within thirty days from the date of the alleged refusal. The supreme court of the District of Columbia shall have, and it is hereby given, authority and jurisdiction to enforce the requirements and provisions of this section in respect of the sale of tickets on the petition of either of the aforesaid railroad companies or any citizen of the District of Columbia. And power is hereby given to the Metropolitan Railroad Company and the Rock Creek Railway Company to contract with each other for the purchase, sale, lease, or joint operation of the line of said Rock Creek Railway Company on Florida avenue and U street, or any part thereof.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect in thirty days after its passage.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JAMES KERR, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5624) to authorize the Oklahoma Central Railroad to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1489) to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8727) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HATCH, Mr. FORMAN, and Mr. WAUGH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to Harrison C. Hobart, brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. PICKLER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2377) to amend "An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the regulations of steam vessels," approved August 7, 1882; and also to amend section 4414, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes, "Regulations of steam vessels;" and

A bill (H. R. 9680) granting the Mount Vernon Barracks Military Reservation to the State of Alabama for public uses.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of 50 citizens of Roaring Branch, of 43 citizens of Watsonville, of 374 citizens of Philadelphia, and of 112 citizens of Mount Morris, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that "no State shall grant the right of franchise to any person who is not a citizen of the United States;" which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of 374 citizens of Philadelphia, of 43 citizens of Watsonville, of 100 citizens of Normalville, of 227 citizens of Philadelphia, of 112 citizens of Mount Morris, of 106 citizens of Pittsburgh, and of 50 citizens of Roaring Branch, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the appropriation of moneys for sectarian institutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Dairymen's Association of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the publication and distribution of the World's Fair dairy tests; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of Branch No. 7, Shipmasters' Association of Detroit, Mich., praying for the establishment of branch hydrographic offices at each of the principal lake ports; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa presented a petition of 127 citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the appropriation of moneys for sectarian institutions; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PEPPER. I have two communications from the legislature of Kansas. To one of them I wish to call attention particularly. It is a resolution asking legislation prohibiting the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from issuing receipts for liquor taxes to persons who are not authorized to sell liquors in the State of Kansas. Two years ago or more (it was, I think, in the first session of the Fifty-second Congress) I introduced a bill on this general subject, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. The high-license States are just as much interested in this matter as the prohibition States.

While I do not expect any legislation on this subject this year, I hope the Committee on Finance next year, when the subject will be presented to them, will give us some favorable action upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the memorial.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the paper proposed to be read?

Mr. PEPPER. A resolution of the State legislature of Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Then of course it is right to have it read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 8.

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein) That the Senators in Congress from this State be instructed, and the Representatives be requested, to secure such legislation as will require the collector of internal revenue for this State to refuse to issue receipts for special tax to retail dealers in intoxicating liquors to any person or persons except such as hold proper permits to sell intoxicating liquors under the laws of this State.

I hereby certify that the foregoing house concurrent resolution passed the house of representatives of the State of Kansas on the 6th day of February, 1895, and the senate of the State of Kansas on the 6th day of February, 1895.

FRANK L. BROWN,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. PEPPER presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Kansas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 17 (by Mr. Street).

Whereas the State of Kansas furnished troops for the protection of the frontiers against the frequent raids of Indians and for the subjection of the same; these troops were known as the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Kansas Volunteer Cavalry.

Whereas these regiments of troops did noble service for the protection of the settlers on the frontiers of Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, and Texas.

Whereas the Nineteenth Kansas suffered great privations of cold and hunger, whereby many members of said regiment were severely frozen during the winter campaign of 1868 and 1869, and the health of many were permanently ruined by want of sufficient rations, especially those at camp known as Camp Starvation, on the Cimarron River, where the frozen and disabled were compelled to subsist upon hackberry seeds for a period of many days, to the great injury of many; and

Whereas, during a campaign of nearly thirty days on the Staked Plains (the Llano Estacado) of Texas, great suffering was again encountered for want of rations, and by reason of the failure of transportation all the property of the men and all stores were abandoned and burned; and

Whereas no adequate provisions have ever been made for pensioning these troops and no provisions have ever been made for the care of any of these soldiers at the homes provided for Union soldiers: Therefore

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to secure the passage of such legislation as will pension the members of these organizations of Kansas volunteers, and that the same provisions may apply to their admission to soldiers' home, and that the same provisions now applying to admission of Union soldiers to the home at Dodge City, Kans., be made to apply to the soldiers of these regiments; and that the State be allowed $100 commutation for each of these under the same conditions that apply to the soldiers of the Union Army.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Members of Congress, and to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C.

I hereby certify that house concurrent resolution No. 17 passed the house January 31, 1895, and passed the senate February 5, 1895.

FRANK L. BROWN, Chief Clerk.

STATE OF KANSAS, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, W. E. EDWARDS, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the following and annexed is a true and correct copy of the original instrument of writing filed in my office February 6, 1895.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka, Kans., this 6th day of February, 1895.

W. E. EDWARDS, Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a memorial of the legislature of the State of Oregon, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the memorial.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask what document is being read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a memorial of the State legislature of Oregon.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is rather unusual to have so long a document read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is usual to have memorials of State legislatures read.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Oregon, I suggest that the memorial be printed in the RECORD instead of proceeding with the reading.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have no objection to that course, if it is printed in the RECORD in full.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 6.

To the Congress of the United States:

By the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of Oregon (the senate concurring):

We, your memorialists, respectfully represent that during the years 1855 and 1856 war was made upon the white settlers of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, which, though known locally as the Yakima and Rogue River wars respectively, was in fact a collusive effort on the part of the native race to exterminate the American settlers of the north Pacific Coast, during which volunteers were called out to assist the regular soldiers of the United States, and men and property were furnished by the settlers of Oregon and Washington (as found by a commission appointed by act of Thirty-fourth Congress, chapter 129, section 11) to the aggregate amount of $6,011,459.96.

That this sum found due by the commission, consisting of Gen. Rufus Ingalls, United States Army, Capt. A. J. Smith, United States Army, and L. F. Grover, since governor of Oregon and United States Senator, was scaled down arbitrarily and unjustly by the Third Auditor of the United States Treasury the full difference between the prices of labor and property on the Pacific and Atlantic sides of the continent at that time to the scales of the latter, thus withholding the sum of $3,296,643.81 lawfully and justly due the people of Oregon and Washington for the services rendered and property furnished.

The following is section 4 of an act passed by the Oregon Territorial legislature at its session of 1855-56, fixing the rate of pay for the volunteers called for, showing the local valuation of the service and property:

"SEC. 4. Whenever such volunteers are called and received into the service of the Territory by virtue of this act, each noncommissioned officer and private shall be entitled to receive $2 per day and rations, and $2 per day for the use and risk of his horse and equipments, except for horses actually killed in action, unavoidably lost, or reported unfit for service and turned over to the quartermaster, in which case the owner shall receive the appraised value thereof. And all commissioned officers shall receive the same pay as officers of the same rank in the Army of the United States: Provided, That commissioned officers shall receive the same pay for use and risk of horses as noncommissioned officers."

The act of which the above is an extract contained an emergency clause, and the men who responded to the call were mainly of the patriotic frontier class, to whom the wealth winners of the nation are much indebted. They are now nearing the end of life, and only ask at your hands what was found to be justly due and arbitrarily and unjustly withheld.

The men thus served are many of them old and needy, and can therefore add necessity to their plea for justice. Moreover, they do not understand why as soldiers they are not as well entitled to pensions and land warrants for services rendered and risks incurred as any other soldiers of the Republic.

We would also submit that the soldiers who served in the Cayuse war of 1847 and 1848 under the provisional government of Oregon should receive pension on the same basis as the soldiers of the Mexican war.

In the preparation of a bill in accordance with the prayer of this memorial our delegation in Congress is respectfully requested to make provision for the payment of any sum of money that may be awarded by this act direct to each individual for whom it is intended by the issuance in each case of a Treasury warrant payable to the order of each person above named or their assigns, said warrants to be forwarded to the treasurer of the State of Oregon, to be handed to such persons upon satisfactory proof that he or she is the person for whom the said warrant is intended.

Whereas the subjects of the foregoing claim are preferred by men widely scattered and are therefore unable to present their claims as individuals in the Court of Claims: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress be forwarded each a copy of this memorial and ask their earnest service in securing the justice herein prayed for.

Adopted by the house January 30, 1895.

Concurred in by the senate January 31, 1895.

CHAS. B. MOORES,
Speaker of the House.

JOSEPH SIMON,

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF OREGON,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Salem, Oreg., February 11, 1895.

I, H. R. Kincaid, do hereby certify that I am the secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State; that the foregoing transcript of house joint memorial No. 6, as unanimously adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the eighteenth biennial legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, has been by me compared with the original copy of the said house joint memorial No. 6 now on file in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript thereof and the whole of said original house joint memorial No. 6.

ST. PAUL'S CHAMBER, 23 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND,
London, W. C., January 1, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to forward you a copy of a memorial signed by 354 members of the British House of Commons.

As the object of the memorial is of the highest importance, and the signatures represent all shades of political opinion in the British Parliament, I venture to ask for the prayer of the memorialists your earnest consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

W. RANDAL CREMER.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL, Senator.

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

In response to the resolution adopted by Congress on April 4, 1890, the British House of Commons, supported in its decision by Mr. Gladstone, on June 16, 1893, unanimously affirmed its willingness to cooperate with the Government of the United States in settling disputes between the two countries by means of arbitration. The undersigned members of the British Parliament, while cordially thanking Congress for having, by its resolution, given such an impetus to the movement and called forth such a response from our Government, earnestly hope that Congress will follow up its resolution, and crown its desire by inviting our Government to join in framing a treaty which shall bind the two nations to refer to arbitration disputes which diplomacy fails to adjust. Should such a proposal be made, our heartiest efforts would be used in its support, and we shall rejoice that the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have resolved to set such a splendid example to the other nations of the world.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was requested by the president of the National Academy of Sciences to present the report, which the academy makes in accordance with statute, upon the standards for electrical measure. The existing statute provides for the printing of the report, so that no action is necessary.

MRS. EVALYN N. VAN VLIET.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill (S. 684) for the relief of Mrs. Evalyn N. Van Vliet, which passed the Senate, was amended by the House of Representatives and the amendments referred to the Committee on Pensions. I report back the bill, and move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PALMER, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. HAWLEY were appointed.

PREVENTION OF DESECRATION OF GRAVES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4693) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia, to report it favorably without amendment. Inasmuch as a bill in its express terms has passed the Senate, but the other House passed a bill of their own, and as it is a matter of importance to the medical profession of the District, I ask for the immediate consideration of this bill.

Mr. BATE. Are we through with the morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not concluded.

Mr. BATE. I must object.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that this is a measure which passed the Senate. The other House in place of passing the Senate bill passed a House bill in the same terms. It is a matter that the medical fraternity of the District are greatly interested in, and it will only take a moment to pass the bill. The Senator does not object, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOLLEY P. HART.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2745) to authorize the Postmaster-General to refund to Volley P. Hart, postmaster at Sedalia, Mo., moneys sent him by the Post-Office Department for disbursement and lost by the failure of the First National Bank of Sedalia, to report it favorably, without amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage, as its passage will involve some further action, which it is necessary, if done at all, should be done at this time. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Colorado?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Postmaster-General to refund to Volley P. Hart, postmaster at Sedalia, Mo., the balance of the $9,000 received by him on the 13th of April, 1894, from the Post-Office Department to pay postal clerks and office force for the months of April, May, and June, 1894, and deposited by him in the First National Bank of Sedalia, which remained in the bank at the date of its failure, on May 4, 1894, not to exceed $8,000; but before the balance shall be so refunded Volley P. Hart shall assign and transfer to the Postmaster-General his claim against the First National Bank of Sedalia for the balance of $9,000 and all dividends thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. F. LYNCH.

Mr. CAMDEN. On the 2d of January there was referred to the Committee on Appropriations a resolution submitted by me, the consideration of which that committee desire to be relieved from, and that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay C. F. Lynch the difference between the amount of compensation received by him as an employee of the Government on the riding page roll of the Senate and the salary of messenger, which duty he has performed from the 16th day of December, 1893, to the present time, and as long as he continues to perform the duties of messenger, to be paid out of the appropriation for salaries of officers, clerks, messengers, and others, Senate, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

JOSEPH W. ADY.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] on the 12th instant, to report it favorably, without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Joseph W. Ady, the contestant of the seat of JOHN MARTIN, a Senator from Kansas, the sum of $2,000, in full of expenses incurred by the said Joseph W. Ady in his said contest.

Mr. CAMDEN. I will state that the resolution was approved by the Committee on Privileges and Elections and referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KYLE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will go to the Calendar.

JOSEPH M'GUCKIAN.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] on the 13th instant, to report it favorably, without amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph McGuckian be placed on the messenger roll of the Senate at a salary of $600 per annum, to be paid monthly out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that he be assigned to one of the committees of the Senate now without a messenger.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. I will state that it has been reported favorably on the recommendation of a large majority of Senators in this Chamber. The man to whom the resolution refers has been in the employ of the Government about thirty years, and is now old; he has been thrown out of employment, and it has been recommended that he be placed on the roll of the Senate at $600 per annum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to object, but I want to make an inquiry. When we authorize an individual by name to be put on the Senate roll, does that put him out of the power of the Sergeant-at-Arms? Can the Sergeant-at-Arms remove him if he thinks it necessary, or appoint some one else in his place?

Mr. CAMDEN. I think not.

Mr. PLATT. I think we ought to go very carefully about such business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McLAURIN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go to the Calendar.

ADVANCES BY CERTAIN STATES FOR WAR OF 1812.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted the following report;

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8294) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year, ending June 30, 1896, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, and agree to the same.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the Senator what amendment No. 15 is. Mr. BLACKBURN. That is an amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], providing for the payment of small sums to a half dozen or more consuls, amounting in the aggregate to five or six hundred dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senate recedes from that amendment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senate recedes from that amendment, with the understanding that it is properly a deficiency; that it should be in the deficiency bill, and is out of place in this bill.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Senator what was done with the Senate amendment making appropriations for Samoa.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That amendment was agreed to by the House of Representatives.

I ask for the adoption of the report, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the Senate insist upon its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a further conference upon the item left open to dispute between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE were appointed.

FRED KORMANN.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2388) for the relief of Fred Kormann.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to confirm the cash entry numbered 8309, of lot 4 in section 23, lot 3 in section 24, lot 1 in section 25, and lot 5 in section 26, in township 110 north of range 29 west, in the district of lands subject to entry at the United States local land office at Marshall, Minn., made by one Fred Kormann on the 6th of March, 1891, and directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT TO MARYLAND REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1795) to aid in the erection of a monument to the Maryland heroes of the Revolutionary war. I am advised that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] would like to make a few remarks upon the bill, and as he does not often ask the indulgence of the Senate I trust he may be allowed to proceed at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Maryland proceeding at this time? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I desire to return my acknowledgments to the Senator from New York for his valuable offices in my behalf in this connection.

Before proceeding with the remarks I desire to submit, I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the Maryland Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Maryland, is engaged in the praiseworthy effort to erect in the State of Maryland a monument to all patriots of said State who aided during the Revolutionary war to establish the independence of Maryland and of the United States; and

Whereas the services and sacrifices of the patriots of Maryland in said war are eminently worthy of commemoration: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $40,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the said Maryland Society of the Sons of the American Revolution to aid in erecting in the city of Baltimore, Md., a suitable monument to the memory of the patriots of Maryland who aided in establishing the independence of the United States, the money to be paid to the society aforesaid under the order of the Secretary of War: Provided, That the design for the said monument shall be approved by the Secretary of War; and the sum hereby appropriated shall not be available until a contract shall have been made for the completion of the work.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, the Maryland society of the "Sons of the American Revolution" is engaged in the praiseworthy effort to erect in the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, a monument to commemorate the services of General Smallwood and the officers and men of the "Old Maryland Line" of the Continental Army in the Revolutionary war. It is for this purpose this appropriation is asked.

The national congress of the Sons of the American Revolution, composed of delegates from 30 States of the Union, have petitioned the Congress of the United States for the passage of this bill.

On the 19th of April, 1775, the first blood shed in the Revolutionary war was poured out at Lexington.

North and south went the news, upon the wings of the wind!

"The voice of Patrick Henry from the mountains answered that of James Otis by the sea."

"Paul Revere's lantern shone through the valley of the Hudson and flashed along the cliffs of the Blue Ridge."

Although the despot's heel was not upon the shores of the Province of Maryland, his touch not at her temple doors, and no enemy's sword unsheathed within her borders, yet the tocsin of war found a prompt response in the hearts of her sons!

Then it was that the "Old Maryland Line" sprung into existence.

One battalion of 1,444 men was at once formed; they were of the best and the flower of the young men of the Province. Colonel Smallwood commanded them.

This Old or First Line was recruited from time to time until the Colony of Maryland had furnished to the Continental Army more than 20,000 of the best of her sons. The Old Line of Maryland was no ordinary body of men. In the very beginning of the war they distinguished themselves in a manner that elicited the highest praise and approval of General Washington, and ever after secured to themselves his absolute confidence in their valor.

No troops in the Continental Army rendered better service, endured more fatigue, or won greater glory than the "Maryland Line."

In July, 1776, General Howe conceived the design of seizing New York and annihilating the main body of the American Army, and thus cut off all communication between the Northern and the Southern Colonies. The success of this endeavor would settle the fortunes of the Colonies in their struggle for independence.

The struggle was at hand.

On the 25th of August, 1776, the British landed on Long Island a force of 20,000 men and 40 cannon. It was, says Bancroft, the most perfect army of that day in the world for experience, discipline, equipment, and artillery, and was supported by more than 400 ships and transports in the bay, by 10 ships of the line, 20 frigates, and many small vessels.

Against this vast armament the Americans on the island were no more than 8,000 men, most of whom were volunteers or militia, and they had not the aid of a single platoon of cavalry nor one ship of war.

Washington's address to the Army before the battle proclaimed only too fully his deep solicitude as to the result,

The time is now at hand—

He said—

which must determine whether Americans are to be freemen or slaves.

The fate of unborn millions will now depend, under God, on the courage and conduct of this army.

Our cruel and unrelenting enemy leaves us only the choice of a brave resistance or the most abject submission.

We have, therefore, to conquer or to die. Our own—our country's honor—calls upon us for a vigorous and manly exertion.

The eyes of all our countrymen are now on us, and we shall have their blessings and praises if happily we are the instruments of saving them from the tyranny meditated against them.

Life, liberty, property, and honor are all at stake; upon your courage and conduct rest the hopes of our bleeding and insulted country.

It was in this dark hour that the Maryland Line was destined to enter the field and bear its first shock of battle.

Cornwallis had taken possession of the Cortelyou house, in the rear of Stirling, and the latter saw that if he could not drive him back, or at least hold him where he was, his whole command would suffer death or capture. He resolved upon a costly sacrifice to save his retreating columns, which were now toiling through the salt marshes and across the deep tide-water creek in their rear. Changing his front and taking with him less than 400 of the Maryland regiment, under Major Gist, Stirling ordered the rest of his force to retreat across the Gowanus marsh and creek, which the rising tide was making every moment less and less passable.

Smallwood's regiment, composed in a large part of the sons of the best families of Maryland, nicknamed the "Macaroni" by the Tories of New York, due to perfect equipment, and proud of being distinguished as the best drilled and disciplined of the American forces, were now to have their courage, their self-devotion, and their discipline proved amidst slaughter and murder.

General Lord Stirling placed himself at the head of these sons of Maryland, and "the little band," now hardly numbering 400 men, prepared for an assault upon five times their number of the troops of the invading army, who were inflated with all the arrogance of successful combat.

Forming hurriedly on ground in the vicinity of Fifth avenue and Tenth street, the light column advanced along the Gowanus road into the jaws of battle with unwavering front. Artillery plowed their fast-thinning ranks with the awful bolts of war, infantry poured its volley of musket balls in almost solid sheets of lead upon them, and from the adjacent hills the deadly Hessian Jagers sent swift messengers of death into many a manly form. Still, above the roar of cannon, musketry, and rifles, was heard the shout of their brave leaders, "Close up!" "Close up!" And again the staggering, yet unflinching, files, grown fearfully thin, drew together and turned their stern young faces to their country's foe.

At the head of this devoted band marched their general, to whom even victory had now become less important than an honorable death, which might purchase the safe retreat of his army. Amid all the terrible carnage of the hour there was no hurry, no confusion, only a grim despair, which their courage and self-devotion dignified into martyrdom. The advance bodies of the enemy were driven back upon the Cortelyou house, now become a formidable redoubt, from the windows of which the leaden hail thinned the patriot ranks as they approached. Lord Cornwallis hurriedly brought two guns into position near one corner of the house, and added their canister and grape to the tempest of death.

At last the little column halted, powerless to advance in the face of this murderous fire, yet disdaining to retreat with the disgrace of a flight. Again and again these self-devoted heroes closed their ranks over the bodies of their dead comrades, and still turned their faces to the foe. But the limit of human endurance had for the time been reached, and the shattered column was driven back. Their task was not, however, yet fully performed.

As Stirling looked across the salt meadows, away to the scene of the late struggle at Buckle's Barracks, and saw the confused masses of his countrymen crowding the narrow causeway over Freck's mill pond, or struggling through the muddy tide, he felt how precious to their country's liberty were the lives of his retreating soldiers, and he again nerved himself for a combat which he knew could only prove a sacrifice. Once more he called upon the survivors of the previous dreadful assault, and again the noble young men gathered around their general. How sadly he must have looked upon them—scarcely more than boys—so young, so brave, and to meet again the pitiless iron hail!

The impetus and spirit of this charge carried the battalion over every obstacle quite to the house. The gunners were driven from their battery, and Cornwallis seemed about to abandon the position; but the galling fire from the interior of the house and from the adjacent high ground, with the overwhelming numbers of the enemy who were now approaching, again compelled a retreat.

Three times more the survivors rallied, flinging themselves upon the constantly reinforced ranks of the enemy; but the combat, so long and so unequally sustained, was now hastening to its close. A few minutes more of this destroying fire and 256 of the noble youth of Maryland were either prisoners in the hands of the enemy or lay side by side in that awful mass of dead and dying. The sacrifice had been accomplished, and the flying army had been saved from complete destruction. Amid the carnage Stirling was left almost alone, and scorning to yield himself to a British subject, he sought the Hessian General De Heister, and only to him would he surrender his sword.

On the conical hill, within the American lines, stood the Commander in Chief, General Washington, and, as he witnessed the assault, the repulse, and the massacre, he exclaimed, in agony of heart, "Great God, what must my brave boys suffer to-day!" From the eminence on which he stood the termination of the last struggle of the brave Marylanders was plainly and painfully visible to him.

A part of three of the companies broke the enemy's lines and fought their way through the woods, where they were either killed or captured. Only Major Gist and 13 of his men made their escape across the creek to the American lines. The rest, when the long muster roll next was called, were answered for, as was De la Tour d'Auvergne, "dead upon the field of battle!"

Mr. Field, the historian of that day, says:

The sacrifice of their lives, so freely made by the generous and noble sons of Maryland, had not been made in vain. An hour, more precious to American liberty than any other in its history, had been gained.

The "hour" thus gained, through this fearful sacrifice of Maryland's sons, saved the fortunes of the day to the Continental Army of the American Colonies.

The "hour" thus gained, with the aid of Providence in the shape of a fog which had swept in from the sea, enabled Washington, barely under cover of that fog, to make the most memorable retreat in history. The retreat of Xenophon with his 10,000 Greeks was a signal military achievement of its day. It more than found its parallel in Washington's retreat from Long Island.

"As Washington landed in New York the cheers of his thousands of redeemed soldiers greeted him as the deliverer of the patriot army and the savior of his country."

The hour thus gained made possible the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga and insured that of Cornwallis to Washington at Yorktown.

"During more than twenty centuries of war and bloodshed scarce a score of battles have been decisive of lasting results!" The battle of Long Island is one of these. From Marathon to the field of Waterloo, from Thermopylae to Balaklava there was no martial event which had a greater influence than that which took place on the plains of Long Island.

To this day the people of Long Island point out to strangers where half of the Maryland battalion stemmed the advance "of the whole left wing of the British army, when no other troops were left upon the field, and where the best blood of the State was poured out like water."

Afterwards at Harlem Heights and at White Plains the Maryland troops displayed their valor; they fought five battles in three months, and were the first of the Revolutionary troops to use the bayonet against British regulars with success, and again and again won imperishable renown.

In the many battles which followed the Maryland line maintained the high reputation they had won in these I have mentioned. The evidence which has come down to us from contemporaneous and competent authority proves this fact.

The account of different battles in which they took part, written at the time or shortly afterwards by men like Lee, Marshall, and Washington, can not be questioned. These accounts may be found in the collected writings of these and other eminent men, or most ably summarized in the histories from which I have quoted of the Maryland Old Line, by McSherry and Scharf. They unmistakably show that this portion of the Continental Army was specially relied upon by Washington, and was repeatedly called upon by him when more than ordinary effort was required.

At Monmouth they were sent to "restore the fortunes of the day," and did it! At Germantown their conduct won the highest encomium of General Sullivan.

Their stubborn defense of Fort Mifflin received the praises of the Continental Congress. It must not be imagined that I mean, in thus speaking of the "Old Line," to detract even by implication from the merits of the other forces in the Continental Army. Far from it. "Fortes fuerunt praeter Agamemnona."

When I speak of these I speak as only of a part of the great, the noble army which fought for and secured our liberties. I feel and acknowledge the debt, due to all alike, whether they came from the granite hills of the North or from the level rice fields of the South. I stand ready now and at all times to join in doing honor to them, each and every one, and what faint praise my lips can utter shall always be given to express the great love I bear them all.

Most of the Maryland Line were infantry; there were some artillery, and a few dragoons. The last were sent to the Carolinas and incorporated in the cavalry of Col. William Washington. They were with him when he beat Tarleton and carved with his sword a perpetual reminder of America on that ruffian's hand.

The last encounter of the Old Line with the British in the North was at Stony Point, where Maj. John Stewart and 100 men greatly distinguished themselves. Major Stewart was for this voted a sword by Congress.

Shortly after the Old Line was reorganized and ordered to join the Southern army. Colonel Smallwood was promoted to be general and made second in command of the Southern forces. At the battles of Cowpens and Camden the brunt of the fighting fell to the share of the Maryland Line, and their conduct added fresh brightness to their fame. Col. John Eager Howard at Cowpens, by an opportune and daring charge, revived the failing hopes of the Americans, and converted an impending disaster into a glorious victory.

The superiority of the British forces in the Carolinas forced General Greene, the American commander, to retreat toward Virginia. During the whole of this movement, which was marked by great skill and ability, the larger part of the responsibility fell upon Col. Otho H. Williams, of the Maryland forces, and the final success of this movement was held to be particularly due to his fine soldierly qualities and to the bravery and steadiness of the men he commanded.

At Guilford Court-House, under Gunby, at "Augusta" and Ninety-Six under Duval, the Old Line added another ray to the halo of glory about it.

At Eutaw the Old Line once for all settled the question as to the ability of any troops in the wide world to stand against the British infantry charging home with the bayonet. On the British side was the regiment of the Buffs, one of the most splendid in the British army; it had won renown on all the fields of Europe. It was fresh from home. Its muster rolls were full. It was abundantly supplied with all the munitions that experience could suggest and wealth provide. Its men were mostly Irish—the best fighting men of Europe—and both officers and men full of confidence in themselves and in each other. The British army was well represented by it.

On the other side what a contrast! Save in the quality of the men and officers, how inferior to the first! Badly armed, badly equipped, poorly fed, the Continental troops on one side of the open battlefield made a poor show compared with the brilliant "Buffs" on the other.

The battle began and was fought with varying success, until Rawdon, the British commander, ordered a charge along the whole line to sweep the field. On the British troops came, with leveled bayonets—steady, swift, and apparently irresistible!

General Greene met the charge with two brigades of Maryland and Virginia troops. Immediately in front of Howard's regiment were the "Buffs." Howard sprang forward to meet them, bayonet crossed bayonet, and for a few seconds the strife was terrible. It could not last. One or the other must give way. The "Buffs" broke. The Marylanders pressed forward. The battle was won. Before the "Old Line" Tyranny fled abashed; behind it Freedom marched serene.

With this fight it may be said the work of the Old Line ended. It went to Virginia and was present at Yorktown.

"The drama of the Revolution opened in New England, culminated in New York, and closed in Virginia."

The Old Line fought in seven different States, from Massachusetts to Georgia, in eight campaigns, and in twenty-four battles.

In their own State no clash of resounding arms was heard. Long Island, Brooklyn Heights, Harlem, Fort Washington, Frogs Neck, Trenton, Princeton, Camden, Germantown, Cowpens, Guilford, Augusta, Ninety-six, Eutaw Springs, Yorktown!

What American's heart does not burn within him as he calls the glorious battle roll of the Revolution?

Monuments, Mr. President, make the civilization and mark the gratitude of a people.

It is not necessary to argue the propriety of the erection of memorials of great deeds and great men by the nation.

The best memorial is the grateful recollection of succeeding generations.

If mankind were as they should be, none other perhaps would be required. But common opinion approves, and a universal feeling demands, that enduring monuments should be erected as visible evidence of our gratitude.

Such structures keep fresh in men's minds names that should not be forgotten, and make continual public proclamation of splendid and noble actions.

They teach in the most impressive manner lessons fit for the highest and lowest alike. They incite to great achievement, inculcate the highest virtues, and stimulate patriotism.

The pillar at Thermopylae! What Greek ever read its brief inscription unmoved?

What dweller amid the crags and peaks of Switzerland but thrills when he stands before the statue of Tell?

What is the message to a Frenchman from the column in the "Place Vendôme?"

What Englishman can view Nelson's Column without recalling the glory and the triumph of Trafalgar?

What one of us can stand within the shadow of the shaft at Bunker Hill without feeling his bosom swell with patriotic emotion and grateful remembrance of the deeds of the brave men in whose memory it was erected?

We can not, Mr. President, have too many reminders in these loose days of the simple faith, the incorruptible integrity, the jealous honor, and the indomitable courage of our ancestors.

Contemplate this country, the birthplace of government by the people, the home of the free, the refuge of the oppressed!

With what wisdom were its foundations laid and the laws of its development devised. At once the youngest nation became the foremost, and its institutions the model by which the oldest and the proudest reformed their own.

Macaulay truly said that "they who do not value the deeds of their ancestors will do nothing to give pride to their descendants."

Let us be careful to preserve their names and the record of their deeds from oblivion.

Let us be careful to write them up in proper manner, so that not merely the student of history may be familiar with them, but that the crowds in the streets, our own people, and the stranger in the land may know them well.

This bill, Mr. President, proposes to aid in erecting a monument to General Smallwood and the soldiers of the "Maryland Line" in the war for independence, who, together with other equally brave men, maintained in the field the patriotic resolutions of their brothers in council.

What the ones devised the others made possible, "useless each without the other." It is time such action be taken.

Already the names and deeds of these men are dim in the recollection of the people, and are familiar only to those who search the dusty records of the past.

As to most of them no memorial now exists; as to some, only a moss-covered tombstone in an out-of-the-way locality.

Smallwood's grave is on the north bank of the Potomac, almost within sight of the tomb of his great leader at Mount Vernon; but how few could find it; how fewer still have seen it!

Mr. President, these men were from the State which I share the honor of representing in this body; and for that reason it has been thought proper that I should advocate the passage of this bill.

I am proud of them, Mr. President, as fellow-citizens.

I am glad to know that the men of my State rendered such distinguished services to our common country.

But it is not because they were Marylanders that this monument is to be erected.

Maryland remembers and takes care to demonstrate that she is grateful to her loving and devoted sons. Through the neighboring city you can not pass without visible evidence of that honorable fact.

This memorial is specially to the "Continental soldiers"—the "Old Line"—for services not to Maryland alone but to the whole country.

It is to be a symbol of the Revolution, of a common cause, a common strife, a common triumph; of the cause, not of a class, but of human nature; of the triumph, not of a colony, but of United America!

All who have benefited by the exertions of Continental soldiers, all for whom they fought and bled and died, to whom their memory is precious, should be proud to take part in the erection of this monument.

The services of these men were to the whole country, to all the Colonies, and for the common benefit of mankind.

It was that the right of men to live freely under laws of their own making might be maintained.

And it is because this right has been maintained and is now unquestioned in all parts of the civilized world, save one, and because we now enjoy all the blessings of civil liberty, won by their courage, their devotion, their suffering, and their blood, that the passage of this bill is asked.

The appropriation asked for, Mr. President, in this bill will not merely minister to local pride, it will not foster sectional prejudice; every citizen of this fair land of ours, not of Maryland alone, nor yet of the 13 original States, but every citizen of every State in the Union will feel, as he looks upon the monument which the sum asked for will contribute so much to erect, that he has a right to stand upon the ground where it stands.

It will speak to him not alone of the valor of Smallwood and the Old Maryland Line, but it will speak to him as well of the common sacrifices and the trials of the fathers of the Republic.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McLaurin. I am not quite ready to vote for the passage of the bill, and I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. McPherson. I wish to ask the Senate to take up a bill. Has the bill in charge of the Senator from Maryland been acted upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has gone over under objection.

Mr. McLaurin. I withdraw the objection I made just a moment ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is withdrawn.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "Maryland," to strike out "said," and in line 8, after the words "memory of," to strike out "the patriots of Maryland who aided in establishing the independence of the United States," and insert "Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $40,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Maryland Society of the Sons of the American Revolution to aid in erecting in the city of Baltimore, Md., a suitable monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence, the money to be paid to the society aforesaid under the order of the Secretary of War: Provided, That the design for the said monument shall be approved by the Secretary of War; and the sum hereby appropriated shall not be available until a contract shall have been made for the completion of the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee report to strike out the preamble. The preamble will be stricken out if there be no objection.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence."

JAMES CURRAN.

Mr. McPherson. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2503) for the relief of James Curran.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Postmaster-General to give credit to James Curran, postmaster at Hoboken, N. J., in the sum of $6,566 for postage stamps stolen from that office December 3, 1894, through no fault of James Curran.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF BONDS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the regular order, being Senate bill 2642.

Mr. HILL. What is the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is the regular order. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HILL. There are some bills on the Calendar which should be taken up. I trust the Senator from Arkansas will defer his request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the morning business has not closed. The resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], coming over from a previous day, is laid before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is in order at 1 o'clock, I understand, to move the consideration of any bill on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Arkansas to make such a motion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I asked unanimous consent to avoid making a motion, but if there is objection I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will allow morning business to be disposed of first.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the order of proceeding is that the Chair first lays the regular business before the Senate as a matter of course, so that we may know what we are displacing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has laid the order before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALDRICH on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the Senate a copy of the contract recently entered into between the Treasury Department and the representatives of certain banking houses for the sale of United States bonds.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the resolution will not provoke debate I have no objection to its consideration, but if there is to be debate I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the silver bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see no good reason why the resolution should be passed now. The contract has been made public and is a matter of notoriety.

Mr. HOAR. The contract should be printed as a document.

Mr. GRAY. It has been printed as a document.

Mr. MANDERSON. As a House document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What does the Senator from Rhode Island suggest?

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the resolution, with the consent of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution is withdrawn.

HOOR OF MEETING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. GORMAN on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Friday, the 15th day of February, 1895, and until otherwise ordered, the daily sessions of the Senate shall begin at 11 o'clock a. m., and the morning hour shall terminate at the expiration of one hour thereafter.

Mr. GORMAN. I will modify the resolution so as to read "Wednesday, the 20th day of February."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday, the 20th day of February, 1895, and until otherwise ordered, the daily sessions of the Senate shall begin at 11 o'clock a. m., and the morning hour shall terminate at the expiration of one hour thereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

OFFICERS ON RECEIVING AND TRAINING SHIPS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 15th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate whether or not during the last four years officers of the Navy attached to the ships Richmond and Constitution, stationed at Newport, R. I., and drawing sea pay and commutation for rations at sea, have been furnished and assigned and have occupied quarters for themselves, or their families, or for both, on shore in public buildings or elsewhere, at the expense of the Government, and if so, to state the nature and extent to which this practice has prevailed, and whether or not it is in accordance with any authority of law.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JAMES KERR, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7414) granting increase of pension to survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars and to their widows; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 273) extending from March 1, 1895, to April 15, 1895, the time for making returns of income for the year 1894.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Wessells; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7414) granting increase of pension to survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars and to their widows was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Morning business has closed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when the name of Mr. MILLS was called). My colleague [Mr. MILLS] is detained at home by sickness.

Mr. DUBOIS (when Mr. SHOUP's name was called). I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. I inquire whether the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if I were at liberty to vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT (after having voted in the affirmative). I rise to inquire if the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

Mr. BATE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], both of whom are necessarily absent at this time.

Mr. HILL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MURPHY] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] has voted, or if a pair with him has been announced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that he has not voted.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has a pair with him been announced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No pair has been announced.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then, if I may, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 27; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the bill be read at length.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Finance report to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill down to and including the words "Sec. 9," on page 5, in the following words:

That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of the United States to the amount of $500,000,000, coupon or registered, at the option of the buyer, payable, principal and interest, in coin of the present standard value, and bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, and not to be sold at less than par, the bonds to mature thirty years from date, and be redeemable at the option of the Government after twenty years; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to use the proceeds of the sale of said bonds to defray current expenses of the Government, and for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes and of Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, as hereinafter provided. That said bonds shall be of the denominations of $30 and $50, and multiples of said sums, respectively, at the option of the purchasers thereof, and shall be in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties to the United States, and from all taxation by or under State, municipal, or other local authority, and said bonds and coupons shall be made payable at the Treasury of the United States. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds herein authorized for sale, he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department, and at any subtreasury, and any bank in which United States funds are deposited, it being the intention of this act to give full and free opportunity for general subscription, and payment therefor may be made in gold coin, but the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, accept in payment therefor United States legal-tender notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

SEC. 2. That national banking associations are hereby authorized and permitted to issue circulating notes to the par value of United States bonds deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the tax on such circulation is hereby reduced to one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st days of January and July of each year.

SEC. 3. That section 9 of the act approved July 12, 1882, entitled "An act to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and hereafter no national banking association continuing to transact business as such shall retire the whole or any part of its circulation without written authority therefor from the Secretary of the Treasury; and so much of section 12 of the said act as authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurers of the United States and to issue certificates therefor be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but this repeal shall not in any manner affect the validity or use of such certificates heretofore issued.

SEC. 4. That hereafter national banking associations desiring to retire the whole or any part of their circulating notes shall, if so required by the Secretary of the Treasury, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States gold coin equal to the amount of notes to be retired, and each of said banking associations shall at all times keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, in gold coin, a sum equal to 5 per cent of its outstanding circulating notes, and the same shall be held and used for the redemption of such notes, and for no other purposes.

SEC. 5. That not exceeding one-half of the lawful reserves on account of deposits now required by law to be kept by national banking associations may consist of bonds of the United States issued under this act, the same to be estimated at their par value.

SEC. 6. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of the proceeds of the sale of bonds as hereinbefore provided, to cancel and destroy all United States legal-tender notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, of denominations less than $10, and to issue a like amount of silver certificates in denominations of $1, $2, and $5, which said certificates shall be payable to bearer in silver, it being the intention of this act that neither the Treasury Department nor national banks shall issue or keep in circulation any notes, other than silver certificates, of a less denomination than $10; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, at the request of any holder, to receive Treasury notes and United States legal-tender notes, and to issue in lieu thereof silver certificates in denominations less than $10, and he shall cancel and retire the legal-tender notes and Treasury notes so received.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of the proceeds arising from the sale of the bonds hereinbefore authorized, and from any surplus revenues, to redeem and cancel, and not reissue, said United States legal-tender notes and Treasury notes whenever and as fast as the aggregate circulation of United States legal-tender notes, Treasury notes, silver certificates, and national-bank notes shall be in excess of the aggregate amount of United States notes, Treasury notes, national-bank notes, and silver certificates in circulation at the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 9.

The committee also report, on page 6, line 8, before the word "price," to insert the word "market;" in line 9, after the word "in," to strike out "London" and insert "New York;" and in line 16, before the word "may," to strike out "in denominations of less than $10;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive at any United States mint, from any citizen of the United States, silver bullion of standard fineness, and coin the same into silver dollars of 412½ grains each. The seigniorage on the said bullion shall belong to the United States, and shall be the difference between the coinage value thereof and the market price of the bullion in New York on the day the deposit is made, and all expenditures for coinage done under the provisions of this act shall be paid out of said seigniorage; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the depositors of such bullion standard silver dollars equal in amount to the price thereof as aforesaid; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued thereon, in the manner now provided by law.

The committee also report to strike out the remainder of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations, and employ such clerical and other force as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, and a sum sufficient for that purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to give notice that after the disposition of the present bill I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7273) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Mr. HIGGINS. We could not hear the Senator from South Carolina on this side.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply gave notice that when the pending bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 7273, with which the Senator is familiar.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from South Carolina will not undertake to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not commit myself to any agreement on that subject.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senate will have to settle it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senate will have to settle it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In view of the lateness of the session and the fact that doubtless every member of the Senate has his mind made up as to the bill which has just been taken up, and in view of the further fact that the friends of the bill do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate by discussion, I ask unanimous consent that we fix an hour to-day at which we may have a vote on the bill. I will suggest 4 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. After conference with many Senators upon this side of the Chamber I am satisfied that it will be impossible to get an agreement to vote upon the bill to-day. There is a very strong and a very natural feeling that in the present condition of the country a bill of such importance ought not to be passed or voted upon except after the fullest discussion. I therefore object to the proposed agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I regret very much that some time can not be fixed upon for a vote in the Senate. The friends of the measure are perfectly willing to submit the matter to a test at any hour. I regret that the minority of the Senate should think it necessary to resort to dilatory tactics to avoid a vote on this question. Of course, owing to the shortness of time, it will be impossible to press a vote for a very great length of time, but I will ask the Senate to remain in session to-day until we reach a vote on the bill, if it is possible to get it.

Mr. HALE. In view of the fact that only eight or nine days remain for the consideration of the business that must be done by the Senate, let me ask the Senator whether he thinks it is now good policy to bring up this bill, which will give rise to long and perhaps heated discussion and engross the time of the Senate, and thereby endanger the passage of the appropriation bills, which surely would result in an extra session of Congress. I know in asking this question that the Senator is a calm-minded man and contemplates things that will come up in the future, and I should be glad to have him give us some indication as to whether it is his intention to hold the bill here day and night, to the exclusion of appropriation bills.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be glad to avoid exactly the contingency that has been suggested by the Senator from Maine, and for that reason I suggested that an hour should be fixed for a vote in the Senate. There is not a man in this body who does not know how every other man in the body will vote on this question. A discussion of an hour, a day, or a week will change nobody's conviction. It is a matter that has been fully and fairly discussed and understood. It has been weighed and considered by every member of the body. Every man has his mind already made up. I am willing and the friends of the measure are willing to put the matter to a test now without a word of debate.

If the opponents of the bill, for the purpose of avoiding a vote, see fit to resort to a discussion or debate which will look to us as having for its prime purpose to avoid a vote at all, of course we can not help it; but we must make an earnest effort to reach a vote on the bill.

I do not propose to jeopardize the passage of an appropriation bill. There will be plenty of time, in my judgment, to pass the appropriation bills if there is no time wasted. The friends of the measure do not propose to run the risk of an extra session by prolonging its consideration if the minority, as I believe, in the Senate manifest a disposition to prevent the passage of the bill. Of course we can not help it if they choose to do it.

Mr. HALE. Now, if the Senator will allow me, he is shifting the burden. It is not dilatory tactics for the minority, or for any portion of the Senate, to insist that the bills which must be passed to complete the business of this Congress shall be considered. The Senator himself and those who have joined with him in bringing this matter before the Senate have created this situation. It is they who have obtruded this bill here, I do not say it in an offensive sense, because the majority has the right to take up any bill; but it is they who have made the situation and have made the danger.

It seems to me that it is going a little too far when a disposition is manifested, as is always manifested when this subject is up for a fair debate, for the Senator to intimate that it is dilatory in its purpose and nature, and is meant for delay. The Senator knows that in all forms when this great question has come up heretofore there has been plenty of debate. Senators have expressed themselves freely upon both sides of the question. There can not be a resolution offered in the morning hour on the subject that does not go over and give rise day after day to debate much of the day. The Senator will not himself intimate, because he is a fair-minded man, that reasonable debate upon this question is dilatory in its nature.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him if he can name any number of hours that the opponents of the bill will require for debate? I do not think there is a single friend of the bill who is disposed to consume a minute's time in debating it.

Mr. HALE. I have heard the Senator ask that question a great many times in reference to another bill that we had up in the last session of Congress. I heard that question asked when the majority was attempting to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. But, if I may say so, it is not a real, pertinent, square question. I can not tell you. It may be that I shall not want to debate the bill one moment.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator suggest to me how I can square it better than it is squared?

Mr. HALE. The truth is that whenever Senators want to get a measure through that suits them they turn around and accuse the other side of dilatory tactics. Now, that is not so. Only a fair measure of debate is all that anybody wants. I know that the Senator from Arkansas in managing this bill will manage the bill carefully and will handle the Senate carefully. I am willing to trust to his management.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question in this connection. Does he believe any amount of debate would change any vote from the present intention of the Senate if we were to vote right now, even if the discussion of the bill should continue for a month?

Mr. HALE. I suppose that may be true about almost all measures we debate and discuss here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then I do not see any good reason why we may not vote now, except that the minority fear they will be beaten on the vote; that is all.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator were in the minority and objecting to this bill, he would want the privilege of debate. He knows he would.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly; and we do not propose to deny that privilege.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will go on with the bill, and that it will not be intimated there are any dilatory tactics here. There is no disposition to resort to dilatory tactics.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think it will require an intimation for everybody to understand the purpose of a protracted debate on the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there are some facts in connection with this bill that I think ought to be stated. Of course they are apparent to everyone, but it would do no harm to state them.

There is no member of the Senate and no person in the United States who expects that the bill will become a law if it passes the Senate, and any time spent here in pressing it for consideration will certainly, so far as any practical results are concerned, be entirely wasted. But when the Senate of the United States is called upon to express its opinion upon a question of such importance, it is not right that the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator should suggest that it be passed upon without discussion. An innumerable number of amendments will be offered to the bill. That can not be helped. You can not expect Senators to vote upon a single proposition involving the whole financial question without amendment and without debate.

If there was any real benefit to come to the country or any result to be reached by pressing the bill for consideration that would be one thing; but the Senator from Arkansas, if he is frank to the Senate and the country, must admit that he does not expect the bill to pass the coordinate branch of Congress and receive the Executive approval. Therefore I think it comes with ill grace from that Senator to suggest that a bill of such importance should be hurried through the Senate without discussion at this hour of the session.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Arkansas that in all human probability debate will not change a vote in this body, but perhaps there is another function of debate which has not been alluded to by him or by any other Senator which is as important as the supposed capacity of debate to influence votes. The country expect, and I think will demand, that a measure so important and far-reaching as this should not be passed (if it is true, as the Senator from Arkansas thinks, that it will be passed) without an exposition of the objections to the measure by those who differ from him, and who represent a very large constituency in the country.

It will be necessary, I think, before the bill passes to inquire why it is that after having spent the long weary weeks of the summer of 1893 in the attempt that was finally successful to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act the same Senate or the same Congress is asked to restore that purchasing clause in an intensified form; that is, intensified as it seems to many who are opposed to the bill brought forward by the Senator from Arkansas. Therefore I do not think it is unreasonable to say that before the bill passes it should receive such debate and discussion, if not by its friends by those who oppose it, as will give to the country a thorough understanding of what objection there may be to the measure.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course I have no objection to debate. In reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] a moment ago, I have to say that we are in no sense the guardians of those who constitute another body here. We are not responsible for the action of the Executive. Our business is to discharge our duty as we see it. The majority of the Senate are ready and willing to act on this question. We would be glad to do it. We have no power to cut off debate and no wish to cut off debate. Our only request is that the debate shall proceed as rapidly as possible, and that we may have a vote at the earliest possible hour. I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until we reach a vote, if it can be accomplished.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the recent transaction between the Treasury and certain contractors for the purchase of gold on the part of the Government has been the subject of considerable discussion on this floor and elsewhere, and it is as pertinent as probably anything that could be offered in the discussion of this bill, to consider somewhat the circumstances under which the Treasury was placed and which led to and demanded the making of that contract.

I do not enter into an explanation of the transaction with any expectation that the opinions of those who from political partisanship or difference upon the silver question have chosen to take ground against the contract will be affected by it. It is not to be expected that anything will alter in this Congress the probability or possibility of result. A sufficient number to prevent any such action as the President suggested to be desirable for the benefit of the country has already disclosed itself, and I presume I shall violate no rule of propriety if I recur to a fact stated the other day by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], that we know the House of Representatives has refused even the least relief.

I am entitled to read, I believe, from a document which I find printed, in which are set forth the views of the minority of a certain committee in respect to a proposal to meet the opportunity which was reserved as a privilege to the United States in the contract to which I have alluded. It presents at once in a summary fashion the ground upon which, in great part, the successful opposition has stood. It is there written:

Believing that the Secretary of the Treasury has now by law the right to redeem legal-tender notes by the payment of either gold or silver coin, which ever is most convenient for the Government, and believing that the exercise of this discretion by the Secretary of the Treasury is absolutely necessary to protect the Government from organized and unorganized raids upon the coin reserve, we are not willing to indorse, directly or by implication, the administrative policy which has precipitated the present financial conditions. Neither are we willing, by authorizing bonds for the purchase of gold, to pledge the Government to a policy which discriminates against silver as a standard money and recognizes gold as the only money of ultimate redemption. So long as the note holder is allowed to choose the coin in which he is to be paid, so long will it be futile to attempt to maintain a gold reserve.

That quotation speaks of an administrative policy. It is the policy which was adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury perhaps fifteen years ago, or more, and which has been continuously maintained by every Secretary of the Treasury since; which received in 1890 the explicit sanction of Congress by its declaration in an act that it is the established policy of the Government—the policy pursued by the Treasury to maintain the parity between the two metals. This quotation declares the readiness of those who oppose acceptance of the advantage secured to the United States by the contract mentioned, to see the Secretary of the Treasury proceed to pay out in redemption of the notes of the United States silver, as now coined, worth but one-half the gold coin, which is the standard of value.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him—
Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator will not insist upon interrupting me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. VILAS. I desire to lay before the Senate some facts, and I wish not to have the discussion turned into the customary colloquy. I am sure the Senator from Nevada will recognize that I have always been in the habit of allowing interruptions, and if I were not justified by good reasons in what is before me I should not now depart from my custom.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the remarkable statement which follows in that same document this declaration of readiness to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed to a silver redemption of the public debt of the United States. Says this document:

It is urged that a change of policy at this time will cause embarrassment.

Does the document dispute it? No; but it adds:

If that be true, the blame must be borne by those who first inaugurated the policy and by those who have adhered to it in spite of the clear intent and letter of the law.

Thus it is declared by those who subscribe that document that they are willing that the United States and the people of this country shall proceed to encounter the evils and perils which would follow such a step, which they are pleased to speak of as likely to cause "embarrassment." Mr. President, there is a large body of people in the United States who believe that the "embarrassment" which would follow would be simply the suspension of specie payments, because to suspend gold payments and in place of the gold coins of the United States to tender silver coins, worth but half as much, would be equivalent to specie suspension, for it would be no less than the complete departure from the standard of money by which the Government has measured the value of all its obligations in the past.

We might as well tender any other promise of the United States to pay as to tender a silver dollar in payment of a dollar of present Government indebtedness. The silver dollar of the present time derives all its power to discharge a debt of a hundred cents by reason of the fact that our policy is declared and hitherto has been maintained to hold up that dollar to the equal of a gold dollar. It is as if a promise were written upon it to pay upon the return of that piece of metal a hundred cents of money of the standard which measures contracts at the present time.

Mr. President, there are those who believe that such an act would be followed immediately by a premium upon gold, an increasing premium, until at length, unless some power interposed to resist and check the fall, we should reach the single standard of silver monometallism; to the destruction of one-half of the credits of the Government, and of all credits which have depended upon the good faith and stability of the laws of the United States for the maintenance of the values which rest upon them. There are those who will recall, as the prototype of the conditions to ensue, the events that followed the decline of our money during the war, and will remember how amidst falling houses and commercial ruin, in general financial devastation, this country bore evils which the people ought never to be called upon to sustain, except to meet such a necessity as was then imposed to save their country.

Without enlarging at this time upon the particular results which would follow, I desire to address my observations to that class of men who believe that the standard of values in our country ought not to be so destroyed. They happen to be, I am well assured, a very large part of the people of the United States. They are represented in all the great financial institutions of the United States, in the trust companies, the banks, the insurance companies, the great mercantile houses, and boards of trade in the cities; especially by those to whom, by common consent, the citizens of this country commit in business the guidance of their financial affairs, whose voice we have everywhere heard protesting against this evil.

We have seen already in 1893 what may be expected from the mere approach to such a contingency. We saw this country quivering in the shudder of panic, fear fall upon the land, hundreds, yea, thousands of millions in values blotted out, merely because we were driven to the brink of the abyss, and the eye of the country but looked beyond the precipice over which it seemed we might be about to fall. I do not care to spend time in discussion of the causes or effects of that panic. Its general consequence we all know, a diminution in great part of importations, with the consequent loss of revenue. We know that from one end of the country to the other the cry was for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law. But that repeal merely checked the further inflow of the poison which was destroying our financial system and the strength of our currency.

It did not remove the evil which had already been introduced into the system. There, still contending for place, according to the operation of that inevitable and irresistible law of finance, which long ago Sir Thomas Gresham pointed out to the British Government, have been hundreds of millions of silver exerting their force to expel gold. We did not withdraw that influence by the repeal of that law, but have felt ever since its steady pressure.

A year ago the Secretary of the Treasury borrowed $58,000,000 for bonds at 5 per cent, of which the principal sum was $50,000,000.

He replenished the stock of gold in the Treasury by that transaction. Later in the same year it became necessary to repeat it, and substantially the same transaction took place again. It failed to meet the evil which confronted us.

Then the President, in his message at the opening of this session, called in most earnest words the attention of the Congress and the people to the trouble which was upon us, and the consequences which appeared sure to follow. And he said plainly and unequivocally, after a full discussion of the circumstances:

It is perfectly and palpably plain that the only way under present conditions by which this reserve when dangerously depleted can be replenished is through the issue and sale of the bonds of the Government for gold; and yet Congress has not only thus far declined to authorize the issue of bonds best suited to such a purpose, but there seems a disposition in some quarters to deny both the necessity and power for the issue of bonds at all.

I can not for a moment believe that any of our citizens are deliberately willing that their Government should default in its pecuniary obligations or that its financial operations should be reduced to a silver basis. At any rate I should not feel that my duty was done if I omitted any effort I could make to avert such a calamity. As long, therefore, as no provision is made for the final redemption or the putting aside of the currency obligation now used to repeatedly and constantly draw from the Government its gold, and as long as no better authority for bond issues is allowed than at present exists, such authority will be utilized whenever and as often as it becomes necessary to maintain a sufficient gold reserve, and in abundant time to save the credit of our country and make good the financial declarations of our Government.

Mr. President, there was not only this declaration by the Executive as to the course he should pursue, but there was equally the submission of the Executive to Congress, in the invitation to Congress to exercise the functions which the Constitution devolve upon it, and provide against the peril to the national Treasury and the happiness of our people. But what followed? Nothing, nothing but the fruitless distraction of faction and factional cries. We have had in result only manifestation of the impotence of Congress to meet the condition of peril in which the nation was placed.

But again, after full waiting, when in less than two months from the last purchase of gold it became apparent that but a short time would suffice to remove from the Treasury its entire stock of gold for redemption, the President, not yet resorting further to the power lying in the old statutes of the United States, appealed anew to Congress, and on the 28th of January, with words of solemnity, yes, as was said by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] yesterday, with an appeal almost pathetic, he solicited afresh the legislation which might preserve the country against the peril before it, from the patriotism and high sense of duty of men charged with legislative responsibility. He pointed out that in the year preceding his message $172,000,000 of gold had been drawn from the Treasury, of which over $69,000,000 had been taken within two months, and he freely proffered again, with all the experience he had had, his own candid opinions of the course which ought to be taken, and again he submitted the subject to Congress and again invoked its counsel, its governing direction. And he added:

In conclusion, I desire to frankly confess my reluctance to issuing more bonds in present circumstances and with no better results than have lately followed that course. I can not, however, refrain from adding to an assurance of my anxiety to cooperate with the present Congress in any reasonable measure of relief, an expression of my determination to leave nothing undone which furnishes a hope for improving the situation or checking a suspicion of our disinclination or disability to meet with the strictest honor every national obligation.

Mr. President, I invoke the candid judgment of all upright men that the President of the United States in these communications not only delivered to the legislative body a complete understanding of the circumstances in which the Treasury and the national honor were placed, not only freely tendered his own advice and opinions—as freely as if he was dealing with a Congress of the safe friendship which its party denomination ought to have assured him he might expect—not only proffered his willingness to cooperate in any reasonable measure, but he plainly, openly, honestly, manfully advised this Congress and the people of the United States that he should execute all the power that was given him by law to carry forward the historic honor of the country and preserve the Treasury from reproach, by maintaining the redemption of the bonds and the notes of the United States, as they should be claimed for payment, according to the good faith of the laws under which they were issued.

Mr. President, we all know the result. The measure which was proposed for the relief of the Treasury in the House of Representatives failed to receive sanction; and although there was a strong majority against it, nothing was substituted by that majority in its stead; nothing was brought forward to meet the invitation of the President to provide some reasonable measure of relief. The hopes of the country were crushed to earth; and there remained for the Executive, in order to avert the impending calamity of gold suspension, nothing but to exert the authority given by the statutes, and accompanied by obligation to use it in necessity.

But, sir, few even among those who agree with the President in the general policy which he has pursued, have perhaps realized how greatly he felt the reluctance expressed in that message to the issuance of bonds; how long, how anxiously, he hoped that a patriotic sense of duty would propose to him from the Legislature some reasonable measure of relief. Few have known the imminence of disaster to which the Treasury came to be exposed before—length the action was taken which has at last saved the national credit.

I ask attention to some of the figures which the Treasury Department furnishes, that I think will be interesting to the country and to those who desire to maintain the good faith we have always hitherto supported. I shall present, and ask to print in connection with my remarks, a table which sets forth, first, the withdrawals of gold from and including January 17, 1895, up to the 13th of February, the latest figures obtainable when this statement was furnished.

* President's first message. † First publication of negotiations. ‡ "Hitch" reported. § Second message and contract signed.

OFFICE OF THE TREASURER UNITED STATES,

February 14, 1895.

It begins with the 17th of January, because on that day it was first made perfectly apparent to the Treasury that what is known in bank parlance as "a run" had begun upon it. Large amounts had been withdrawn, as I shall later show, before that time; but much had been withdrawn for exportation, much drawn, in reality, to pay for the bonds which had been purchased from the United States in November, and it was only on the 17th day of January that it became obvious to the Treasury Department that a run was in progress to drain it of its gold.

On that day were taken $1,614,000—I shall not read the exact figures, but give only millions and hundreds of thousands—on the 18th, $3,600,000; smaller sums on the 19th and 21st, less than $1,000,000; on the 22d it reached nearly $1,700,000; on the 23d, over $1,700,000; on the 24th, $3,300,000; on the 25th, $7,150,000; and there was comparative cessation the next day, the demand being but about a million; but on the following day, the 28th, the very date when the President's message was sent to Congress, four million one hundred thousand and upward were withdrawn, followed the next day by over $3,200,000, by nearly $4,000,000 the succeeding day, and $2,300,000 on the 31st day of January.

So, sir, on the last four days of January there were drawn from the Treasury in gold, under stress of the run upon it, $13,685,635. That last day some check was felt. It was occasioned by a fact to which I shall advert more at length a little later, the announcement that the Government had entered into negotiations with great banking houses of Europe to bring gold to this country. And on the 1st day of February the demand was so much reduced that but $1,400,000 were taken. That day the announcement had supplemental assurance of its probable final execution and confidence resumed its sway, so that only $47,000 were withdrawn the Saturday succeeding. Monday, still less; but on the 5th there was resumed demand, and the fact was reported in the newspapers of some interruption of the negotiations. At once the run seemed to start again, over $700,000 being withdrawn; but the fact was explained away, and diminishing withdrawals of gold continued until the 8th of February, when the message of the President announced to Congress the completed execution of the contract. Withdrawals continued to diminish, so that on the 12th of February but $27,000 were withdrawn, on the 13th $36,000, sums little above those ordinarily drawn in the course of business.

Let me now call attention to the condition of the Treasury on the 2d day of February, following the announcement of the execution or probable execution of the contract for the importation of gold from Europe. I wish to have these facts set before the people of the country, who are willing to think fairly upon this subject, that there can be no misunderstanding of the imminence of the peril before which we stood. I present a table, which I shall ask to have printed with my remarks, showing the amount of gold in the Treasury, the various subtreasuries, mints, and assay offices of the United States on the 2d day of February, counting in New York and the other subtreasuries as present all the gold which had been ordered shipped to those places and was then in transit, soon to arrive. For, let me say, the condition of the Treasury with respect to gold coin was such that for some time previously the Secretary of the Treasury had been gathering there all the gold coin he prudently could to meet the great demand in New York.

On that day the total amount of the net gold coin and bullion held by the United States in its Treasury, its nine subtreasuries, its five mints and five assay offices, was but $79,509,381.20, against which there were outstanding of demand gold certificates $36,896,949, leaving in the Treasury of net gold but $42,612,432.20. Attention is first called to the fact that more than all of the net gold that belonged to the United States was in the form of bullion, nearly $44,000,000, while the United States owned but $42,600,000 over and above the aggregate coin certificate of deposit.

When I speak of this let me note for a moment that the utmost capacity to which for some months past it has been possible to crowd the mints of the United States in the manufacture of available coin for redemption is about $5,000,000 per month, making the largest pieces, $20 gold pieces. In Philadelphia, the largest mint, less than $1,700,000 were coined in the first thirteen days of this month, $742,000 in the mint at San Francisco, only $37,000 at New Orleans; none at the other mints, which are not especially adapted to the coinage of gold. So to reduce the gold bullion to a form available for the redemption of notes in gold coin would have taken about eight months. It was available, of course, in one form. Whoever would accept the gold bars from the United States might be tendered them, but at a loss. As much as possible that has been done whenever the loss could be avoided.

But, sir, the interesting part of this table to the point I am discussing is how the free gold coin in New York had become reduced. The table sets forth the amount of gold coin in each of the places where it was held, as well as the amount of bullion. It sets forth, also, the gold certificates of the particular holding of which the Treasury had been notified, so that at any moment the Treasury might be called upon to turn over the gold, and gold had to be regarded as set apart specifically for those certificates, held to order. That left in the New York subtreasury but $9,700,334.50 of gold coin.

OFFICE OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES, February 16, 1895.

Let me advert for a moment to what that means in respect to the run for gold. I have in my hand a table not perfectly accurate, but which sets forth with the best approximate accuracy possible at this time the amount of gold redemption at the New York subtreasury, at Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, and the other subtreasuries. Between the 14th of January and the 1st of February, inclusive, there were paid out by the subtreasury at New York $36,561,905 of gold; at Boston only $994,000; at Baltimore, $22,000; at Philadelphia, $248,000; at Chicago, $101,000; at New Orleans, $5,000; St. Louis, $2,000; San Francisco, less than $1,000, and Washington, $5,540. I give round numbers and not the exact figures.

Mr. PEPPER. Has the Senator from Wisconsin the totals for the cities outside of New York?

Mr. VILAS. I was just reading the figures.

Mr. PEPPER. But the Senator was giving them separately. I mean the totals.

Mr. VILAS. I will give them to the Senator. Thus during those seventeen days there was drawn from the subtreasury in New York $36,561,905, and from all the other subtreasuries but $1,380,235.

Mr. President, that shows that after hurrying such gold as they thought prudent to remove from other subtreasuries to New York, there was left there on the 2d of February but about one-quarter as much as had been drawn from that subtreasury in the previous seventeen days.

Could anything show more perfectly and satisfactorily the imminence of the disaster which impended over the nation? If that drain had not been checked, as it was checked by the announcement of the negotiation of that contract and its probable completion, during the days that the President was waiting after his message of the 28th for action in Congress, we should have been flung to the silver basis or to the suspension of gold, or specie, payments, for the suspension of gold payments is practically the same, as I have said.

On the 30th of January, not yet reinforced to the full extent to which he subsequently was by removals from other subtreasuries, the assistant treasurer at New York gave notice to his official superior in these words, that "he doubted whether he could hold on until Saturday, and the very next day might decide," as it would have decided, if that day had been followed by such a demand as a single day had once already thrown upon the subtreasury, for on the 25th of January there lacked less than $100,000 of $7,000,000 of gold coin paid out by the subtreasury in New York.

I said that few were aware of the imminence of the peril. There were men in the world aware of it, or who shrewdly guessed it; and I shall now present a telegram addressed to the Secretary of State by the American minister to the Argentine Republic, which will show that the great houses of Europe knew how very near to the edge of the gulf the American nation had come. That telegram is as follows:

Buenos Ayres, February 4, 1895.

GRESHAM, Washington:

London and River Bank, the largest in South America, under orders from London to-day refuses all classes of United States exchange. Have you had information of this from London?

BUCHANAN.

Mr. President, it shows the measurement by the great financial establishments of London of the number of days they could trust us. They could no longer wait until bills of exchange negotiated in Buenos Ayres could be shipped to the United States for payment. The time had come when the prudent financiers of the world were driven to the necessity of discrediting all classes of United States exchange. We should have heard of it in but a few days more from London, from Paris, from Berlin, from Vienna, and from every place in the world where commercial honor is valued, as it came to the Secretary of State on the 4th of February from that Republic of South America which has hitherto made it a boast that she imitates and patterns after the institutions of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I think no man who loves his country, no man who would not be willing to see its financial honor defamed, will fail to recognize that here was a situation which demanded of the American Executive instant action, action adequate to the danger which confronted the country. The President and Secretary of the Treasury took it! And how was this calamity averted? As I have already shown, at first by the announcement of the entrance upon a negotiation, with the probability of its success, whereby gold was to be transported immediately from Europe to meet our condition, and, secondly, by the completion of the contract.

I shall after a little advert in more detail to the terms of the contract and the effect which it necessarily caused, but a mere reference to that table, which I have already asked leave to print, will show how quickly public confidence responded to the conditions established. I called attention to the fact that in the last four days of January over thirteen and one-half million dollars were withdrawn. On that last day the announcement was made. It was followed by confirmatory information the next day, and on the 2d day of February, the time when I have exhibited the condition of the Treasury in detail, there were but $67,000 withdrawn from the subtreasuries of the United States and the Treasury as well. Afterwards, when it was said that a hitch, as it was called in the newspapers, I believe, had occurred in the negotiation, the run began again moderately to reappear, but on the completion of the arrangement it dropped, the nominal amount of $27,000 only being taken on the 12th, and $36,000 on the 13th. It was a sympathetic response of public trust, a measure of honor to the Executive in itself.

Mr. President, having shown the conditions by which this contract was demanded, the intense urgency of that demand, let us see what was the remedy which was available to the President. The first and most important question to be inquired into is from what source he should seek the gold.

I said "to the President." I am aware that it is the Secretary of the Treasury who by law is enjoined to administer the public finances, and that it is the Secretary of the Treasury who signed, as the law requires and authorizes him to do, the contract which was ultimately made, as was suggested by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on yesterday. But to affirm that the President of the United States is to escape a particle of responsibility because his Cabinet officer, a member of his official family, did the act, as if to exonerate him, would be something that he would never tolerate in his defense, I am well aware. Nor could he, for the Constitution enjoins upon him to see that the laws are faithfully executed. He is head and chief of the executive administration of the Government. He it is who communicates with Congress in his messages upon the state of the public finances, and is bound to do it, and take every care of the public interest.

Mr. GRAY. May I call the Senator's attention to the language used by the distinguished Senator from Ohio yesterday? He said in one sentence that—the President can in no sense be held responsible for this contract.

And almost in the next he said:

I believe them both to be honorable men in every sense of the word; but I must confess that in my view of the matter they made a very faulty contract for the United States.

Mr. VILAS. To the criticisms upon that contract I am about to draw attention. I make allowance, as every Senator will, for inaccuracy of speech not written. Perhaps the idea or intimation there conveyed might not have been fully intended by the Senator from Ohio.

I wish now to inquire particularly from what source ought the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the gold that was necessary to meet the impending disaster and avert it? Sir, we have heard it stated upon this floor and elsewhere, iterated and reiterated as an accusation, that it ought to have been by a popular loan. I should give greater heed to that criticism if it had not come from the very interest that stood across the path of a popular loan. In the last session of the Fifty-second Congress it was proposed to authorize the Treasury to make a popular loan. It would not be permitted. All through this Fifty-third Congress we have had the legislation necessary for a popular loan presented and urged, but always it has been met in such a way that only the impotence of Congress was demonstrated, not its patriotism.

The criticism that this gold should have been obtained by a popular loan comes, it seems to me, with ill grace from those who have steadily opposed popular loans when they were needed and available for the uses of the Treasury.

But, sir, let us think a moment about a popular loan in reference to its availability for this particular condition. The Secretary was bound to issue bonds under the act of 1870. He could not issue a bond bearing a less rate of interest than 4 per cent. Such a bond could not be sold so as to realize a rate of interest less than that borne upon its face unless a high premium were paid for it. Now, when we talk of popular loans it will be recognized at once, I think, by all men that the people who have small savings and wish to invest them know but little about premiums and the rates of interest fixed by premiums.

If they invest they wish to invest dollar for dollar. It was a wise provision that was proposed by the Senator from Ohio, if I remember rightly, toward the end of the Fifty-second Congress, that small certificates issued at not more than 3 per cent interest payable in no long time should be offered to the people. They would have been readily taken, no doubt, in that way, a safe investment and a convenient one. They who invest in Government bonds by paying high rates of premium make a computation running through a long series of years upon a rule that but a few of us perhaps could readily apply. At least they are men who have considerable means and make large investments, not the ordinary plain people whose money is commonly stored in savings banks for security.

But there is another thing to be said in respect to a popular loan. Where is the gold to come from? Have the people hoarded away gold in the stocking, and are we to withdraw it by a popular loan? Impossible. Very little gold is to be found among the people. The gold is in the institutions which have such facilities for collecting it and opportunities for keeping it in safety. Not much gold is to be found in the ordinary movement of trade and commerce even in the larger cities.

But, sir, let me show another fact, which I will summarize in this way: To have invited a popular loan under the circumstances in which we were placed would have precipitated the evil which it sought to avert. Before the number of days would pass when the bonds could be issued the Treasury would have suspended payment. I am going to try to make that plain by figures.

I ask attention, first, to the issue of bonds proposed in January, 1894. It was the first of the two preceding loans which the Secretary of the Treasury made to sustain the public credit. That loan was invited on the 17th of January. The bids were to be and were opened at 12 o'clock noon of the 1st of February, and the award of the bonds was made on the 3d of February. The final payment, when they were to be delivered, was after ten days, I believe—ten days on the average, though in fact final payments were not received until the 5th of last March.

Now, let me offer this table to be printed with my remarks. It is a table showing the daily withdrawals of gold for United States notes and Treasury notes between the date of the announcement and final payment for the first issue of bonds in 1894. On the 18th of January there was very little withdrawn, $21,000. It ran along until the 23d, when there was a withdrawal of $105,000. Then followed the usual business of the office in small sums until the 3d of February, when award was made of the bonds, pursuant to the invitation and the bids. On that Saturday was suddenly drawn, as against $3,800 the third day before, $5,000 the second day before, $21,000 the day preceding, the large sum of $2,256,380. On Monday, the 5th, $5,980,000; on the 6th, $5,076,000; on the 7th, $1,002,000; on the 8th, $1,152,000; on the 9th, $1,108,000.

* Awarded.

First money deposited February 1; final payment, March 5.

OFFICE OF TREASURER UNITED STATES,
February 4, 1895.

So that in six days, beginning with the day of the award of the bonds, and before the time when payment was to be made for them, there was drawn out from the Treasury $16,576,015. What would have been the condition of the subtreasury with its $9,700,000 only of available gold coin on the 2d day of February if, instead of making a contract with Europe, the Secretary had invited a popular loan, to effect which every dollar of gold would have gone before he would have had returns? The popular loan would in all probability have precipitated calamity.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there, if I do not interrupt him? I do not wish to do so.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly I will.

Mr. SHERMAN. In all the propositions I have made for a popular loan I have connected with it also a loan to be made for gold coin in aid of resumption. At every session for the last four or five sessions I have endeavored to have that proposition carried into law, so that the Department would have not only the three classes of bonds provided by the refunding act but would have a gold bond payable at 3 per cent interest upon which the Secretary of the Treasury could have readily negotiated at any time during his term and he could have connected with it a popular loan, intended to supply a deficiency in the revenue and not in aid of the resumption fund. I will add that it is the fault of both parties that this authority has not been granted, but it is chiefly the fault of the Democratic party.

Two-thirds of the members on this side have been at all times ready to vote for such a bill, which would have provided ample means for the supply of gold for resumption and for the deficiencies of the Government. I was not present awhile ago, but I understood the Senator referred to me in regard to this matter. I wish it to be distinctly understood that the burden, the onus, I may say, of this condition of affairs rests with the majority on the other side of the Chamber and not on this side.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, it is one of the pitiful things about all our discussions in respect to the finances that we can not talk for a moment about conditions but what somebody says from one side or the other, "It is your fault and not ours." Whose fault it was I do not care to discuss, but I think, if we should enter into that discussion, the whole consequences the nation has endured can be charged directly to the vicious legislation of the Republican party with which we have had to struggle in the last two or three years. I do not care to discuss that question. I do not care to enter into this line of controversy. I was alluding to the facts. I had drawn no question between parties at that time, but I called attention to events then imminently pressing upon the President and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have already stated, perhaps during the absence of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, that he had offered measures of relief which I heartily wish had been adopted. I believe if the Secretary of the Treasury had been equipped with the authority mentioned by the Senator from Ohio at an earlier date, in ample time, as he ought to have been, he might have made popular loans sufficient to meet the contingency long in advance. I have shown already that such is not at all the condition now. I have carefully shown how, while Congress was in session and the President was appealing in successive messages for a suitable measure to enable such action without the thought of a foreign loan, resistance to every suggestion, the impossibility of any legislative aid, had finally driven us to the condition when the subtreasury in New York did not contain gold enough to last for the first three days under the demand precipitated upon the Treasury by the loan beginning in January, or notified first in January, 1894.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir; although I hope not to be too much interrupted, because I want to present what I have to say with the least interference.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the question will be along in the line of the Senator's argument. Does he believe that at the time this loan was negotiated a popular loan of a 4 per cent bond upon a 3 per cent basis would have been a successful one?

Mr. VILAS. I have already been arguing upon that point, perhaps during the Senator's absence; I have been arguing that in their nature bonds which could only be sold at a high premium in order to adjust a certain rate of interest can not be available for a popular loan. The people do not want such bonds, nor will usually accept that kind of security. It is men of large means, accustomed to considerable investments, who make such loans.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me another remark, when he considers the fact that in November people were ready to take $154,000,000 of bonds on a 2½ basis or a 2¼ basis, does he not believe that they would have been willing to have taken $60,000,000 of bonds, at least, upon a 3 per cent basis, two months later?

Mr. VILAS. No, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. A better bond and a much more desirable bond for investment?

Mr. VILAS. No, sir; to have called for a popular loan on that basis at the time when this loan was made would have brought about specie suspension in three days.

Mr. ALDRICH. How?

Mr. VILAS. By the demands upon the Treasury to get the gold to pay for it.

The trouble is that the Senator from Rhode Island was not present, and I do not wish to repeat my argument, but I have already shown that there was available less than $10,000,000 in coin money, and even that was all subject to demand upon certificates of deposit, and that during the first three days after award of the bonds under the loan of last year, when there was no such condition of alarm or excitement as there is this year, more by $3,000,000 than that amount of money was withdrawn from the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he leaves out of his calculation two very important elements in the consideration of this question. In the first place, he excludes the gold bullion, which the Treasury Department naturally and properly considers more valuable than gold coin, from the fact that that Department has been perfectly willing to allow gold coin to go out of the Treasury and has been holding on to that bullion to the extent that it was possible to do so.

Mr. VILAS. I am not willing to be called upon again to repeat argument. I have already set forth the entire particulars in respect to the gold bullion in a table which has been presented that gives every item.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator is willing to admit, I suppose, that for the purposes of redemption of United States notes gold bullion was equally valuable with gold coin.

Mr. VILAS. Equally valuable, but not equally available.

Mr. ALDRICH. Equally available.

Mr. VILAS. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. It could be exchanged in twelve hours in New York City for coin at any of the banking institutions in that metropolis. The Senator knows that, I suppose, as well as anyone else.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Rhode Island knows that it could be done only by a loss to the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly there is no loss to the Government.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly there has been in some cases.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is not a banking institution in the United States which holds gold coin which would not be glad to exchange it for gold bullion and prefer to do it.

Mr. VILAS. That fact shows that the bars are worth more than the coin.

Mr. ALDRICH. They are worth more than coin.

Mr. VILAS. To redeem with them would therefore impose a loss. Besides, gold bars are not available to the use of the people if appealed to for what is called a popular loan.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President—

Mr. VILAS. I decline to be interrupted further. I must proceed with the discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to have a dispatch read which has just been received?

Mr. VILAS. I do not wish to be interrupted in my argument and turn it into a colloquy upon something I am not discussing, and to be called upon to repeat what took place while the Senator from Rhode Island was not in the Chamber.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a dispatch in regard to the present price of these bonds in London.

Mr. VILAS. I am coming to that subject by and by, and shall be very glad to have the Senator's statement then. I will presently reach that.

Mr. President, I proceed on the line in which the Senator from Rhode Island interrupted me. Let me further press the fact that a loan in this country would have been of no avail to assist the Treasury in its difficulties. It is to be noted by the table I present of the withdrawals in February, 1894, that between the 3d day of February and the 5th day of March, inclusive, when final payments were made, the Treasury had to give up $20,211,000 of the very money which was borrowed, more than one-third of the $58,000,000; so that in reality less than two-thirds of the amount agreed was actually realized for the loan made. Worse still was the result of the next loan, the loan of November, 1894. On the 18th the Secretary of the Treasury invited bids to be received until the 24th of November. On that day bids were opened and the loan awarded. It was awarded in one sum; but, as everybody knows, the bidder was a syndicate of bankers, who were representatives of investors, combined merely for convenience.

Between the 14th of November and the 4th of December—that was the date on which payment was to be made for the bonds—there were drawn out almost $10,000,000. It would have been much more but for the reason that it was understood and agreed with the Secretary of the Treasury when that loan was made that there should be no such resort to the Treasury as had been experienced during the previous loan. That was an understanding, of course, difficult for the syndicate to carry out, difficult for them to enforce upon all who were beneficiaries of their combination.

The Secretary himself put a check on withdrawals for the time being by giving out his purpose to advertise the names of those who should withdraw gold in large amounts pending the transaction. I am uncertain as to the date. Intimation of his purpose to advertise to the public the names of those financial institutions which thus made a run, as it were, upon the Treasury produced some temporary effect. Ten millions only were withdrawn during the currency of the arrangement. That sum would have exhausted the coin in New York on the 2d of February.

But, after all, what good did it really do?

I offer a table which completes the one I first introduced, showing the entire withdrawals of gold from the 1st day of December to the 16th day of January, inclusive:

OFFICE OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 16, 1895.

From this it appears that, although purchasers of bonds mainly withheld their withdrawals until after the bonds were issued, procuring gold elsewhere for payment for the bonds on the 3d and 4th of December, yet during the month of December about $32,000,000 were taken from the Treasury while the amount exported was less than $10,000,000. The total amount taken from the Treasury between the 1st day of December and the 13th day of February was $80,786,000, as stated yesterday by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], although I then answered him by mistake—thinking he inquired only up to the time of the President's message—sixty-nine or seventy million dollars. The amount of exports during that period of time was but $36,852,000.

Before the Treasury was aware of anything like a run being made upon it over $42,000,000 of gold had been withdrawn. For what? Not for hoarding. It was not in the banks. On the 1st of December the banks held gold to the amount altogether of $96,000,000, and on the 1st of February they held only $83,000,000—$13,000,000 less. This money was withdrawn by those who had invested in the bonds, who had furnished gold for the time being to the syndicate, borrowing it somewhere, and proceeded to the Treasury to take it back again to return to the temporary lenders.

Thus in two months more gold was withdrawn from the Treasury than had been loaned to it in November by $22,000,000, yet but $36,000,000 were withdrawn for export. More than $43,000,000 were withdrawn in that period either to replace the gold which had been borrowed in order to take the bonds issued in November or for the purpose of hoarding when the run began. It is perfectly clear that of the $58,000,000 nominally borrowed upon the bonds issued, the Treasury did not get actually one-half in genuine addition to its stock of gold.

Mr. President, is it not entirely obvious that here was an impossible mode of relief to the Treasury for its real necessity? This has been matter of continual assertion by the very gentlemen who now criticize. The distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], whom I see in his seat, I remember well, criticised the first issue of bonds, because it would amount to only taking gold out with one hand and putting it in with the other, an endless chain of operation. So it has been; simply taking out gold and then putting it back, but with a new issue of bonds required for each revolution of the chain.

Mr. TELLER. That is the case now.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, whatever may be the future, that was assuredly the result of the two loans which were made, and there is but one way in which a popular loan could have averted the impending calamity. If we could have issued perhaps two hundred and fifty or three hundred million dollars, and had that amount of money poured into the Treasury, although in the form of greenbacks, the greenbacks could have been held there, and the amount would have probably been sufficient, with what banks held in reserve, to stop the means of drawing the gold. It would have been, in other words, the forced retirement of the greenbacks to a practically sufficient amount by the Executive. In that manner perhaps a popular loan might have resulted in checking the drain of gold, though at the cost of great and sudden contraction of the currency. But for the purpose in view a popular loan would have been as futile as it is to argue with anybody whose mind is fixed on this subject of silver.

What was the trouble, or the main trouble, of the Treasury? It is forced by our laws to stand as the great supplier of gold for export. We have so devalued our currency that everybody who wants gold proceeds at once to strip it from the Treasury of the United States. We oblige the Government to furnish gold for export whenever the rate of exchange makes it profitable for bankers to export gold. There are men who are ready to take advantage of every turn in the rate of exchange; their business is to make $1,800, as the Senator from Delaware said yesterday, when they can make it by exporting a million dollars of gold.

What do they care that the Treasury of the United States loses $20,000,000 of money if they can make $36,000? That is not their care. Their business is to deal in the exchanges of the world, and it is the duty of those who regulate banking institutions, like the Treasury of the United States, to guard against it. We have no right to complain of it. It is not their fault; it is our fault that when the conditions make it favorable to export gold they can take it from the Treasury to export. So the very first element for a successful contest which should countervail the afflictive conditions presented to the Treasury was that the rate of exchange should be set the other way. It required the Secretary to establish a Government credit in Europe; that was as necessary to effective relief as it was necessary to do anything at all. There was no relief open to him otherwise. It must be done by withstanding the tide of exportation.

Mr. President, was not that the common speech of intelligent financiers whose attention was attracted to our condition during the month of January? Was not everybody who was capable of thinking upon the subject ready to say at once, "There is but one remedy for the United States; this endless chain will move every dollar of its gold unless a credit is established on the other side of the water, whether the exportation goes?"

Sir, there was another reason why a popular loan would have had considerable difficulty in this country. I do not look upon it as a reason so important as the last which I mentioned and discussed, but one of much weight. Both the preceding loans had inflicted substantial losses upon the men who furnished money to the Government. The first loan, in February, 1894, was made at the rate of $117.223 for every $100 bond.

Mr. McPHERSON. What was the interest?

Mr. VILAS. The interest being 5 per cent on $100, but in reality producing to the purchaser of the bond an interest of the slightest shade under 3 per cent.

But though the holders of those bonds had bought them at that price, it did not help the United States except to temporary relief. The Government was obliged to go again to the market, and like many a spendthrift heir of a rich ancestor, it found itself obliged to pay more the second time. It offered bonds of the same character as before, and the bid was $117.07. So there was a difference of 15 cents on the $100 in that loan between what was offered then and what had been given before; but the loan operated some temporary effect, and purchasers of those bonds thought they had done pretty well. The bonds went up to 119.

That price held but a few days, and then down went the bonds as one went the gold, and by the time we realized the necessity for further action, the price of those bonds was 114 in the market. So, for every man who had invested $117.22 there was already a loss of $3.22; for every man who had invested in December $117.07 there was a loss of $3.07; going into many thousands of dollars upon the total amount of $58,000,000 received on each loan.

Mr. President, that was not a comfortable outlook for a popular loan. True, in November there were offered $178,000,000. But the conditions had much changed; and if the amount to be taken was limited to the immediate need, so as to impose the least burden of interest upon the people, it was necessary to go abroad.

But there was another thing to consider. The chance for a successful popular loan was then, is now, matter of speculation. No one can fail to answer what would have been the consequence of its attempt and its failure—our calamity would have been utter and complete.

I spoke of the advantage of controlling the rate of exchange. That advantage has already been enjoyed. By the terms of this contract it is provided that for a considerable period, six months, long enough, it is to be hoped, to cover all the needs of the country, 300,000 ounces of gold are to be shipped to us every month. Thus, there will stand the coming of 300,000 ounces of gold month after month against the tendency to an unfavorable rate of exchange. The effect has already been felt. There has been a cessation of demand—that is perhaps too absolute a word—but a vast diminution of gold exportation.

Another result is fairly to be expected, and so far has been enjoyed, a result which will extend its benefits to a great many people in this country as well as to the Treasury itself. If we restore abroad confidence in the purpose and the power of the United States to maintain the standard of value upon which our debts are based there will be a cessation of the return of American securities. American securities have been coming back upon our market ever since the panic of 1893. It has largely contributed to cause the unfavorable rate of exchange, causing gold exportation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know if the Senator can inform the Senate of the amount of American securities which have been returned to this country, and as to whether they exceed the amount taken on the other side during the last few years.

Mr. VILAS. I am not able to give the distinguished Senator an answer to the question except that I saw it estimated by an exporting banker in New York at $90,000,000 in the year. It is a difficult thing to estimate—I suppose impossible of accurate ascertainment with any means of statistical information at hand.

The tables which I have introduced show, and it is the understanding of all financiers, that there is one thing especially necessary to our financial ease.

This Government is able to support the four or five hundred millions of promises to pay which we have printed on silver discs instead of paper flats. It is able to support and carry all the promises which it has issued, but it can not continually maintain gold redemption without the aid of Congress and the people. It can not maintain that gold redemption under such circumstances as we have been passing through without an immense supply of gold, nor finally unless confidence shall be restored in the markets of the world. It is necessary that the markets of London, Vienna, Paris, Berlin, Brussels, or wherever else American securities are offered at the boards of trade shall be unaffected by fear that what is promised to be paid in gold is to be discharged in silver worth but half as much. If that element is eliminated from the markets of the world, American securities will be valued there, as here, by a correct and just understanding of what is at the bottom of them financially.

There has been much criticism of the price which was paid for the gold, or received for the bonds. I believe never were bonds issued by the United States without that criticism being made. Nobody as Secretary of the Treasury in the history of our Government has ever issued bonds but that he was subjected to the unjust suspicions which, in the minds of some people, are likely to attach to large transactions. It is almost inevitable that any transaction of this kind shall be followed by an improvement in the price of the securities. If it be not, then the Government would have made a bargain that it ought not to desire. The Government of the United States ought not to wish to obtain money from those who supply its necessities on such terms as will impose loss. It would be degrading if it were so. Always it is to be expected that bonds will rise if the credit of the Government is maintained. That is peculiarly the condition in this transaction. Here we had a very perilous exigency, naturally depressing price at the time.

I ask the Senator from Rhode Island now to give me the information as to price he wished to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say to the Senator that the issue price is 113½ plus commission.

Mr. VILAS. That was met fairly by the New York Tribune article read yesterday, which says that 112½ in London is equivalent to only 109½ in New York. If those bonds do not go up in London to 120 the advantage derived from this contract will be less than I now expect.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to contend that the advantages to the Government and the people of the United States would not have been so great if the bonds had been sold at the market price instead of being sold to this syndicate at 8 or 9 or 10 per cent less than the market price?

Mr. GRAY. What is the market price?

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Rhode Island assumes at once that the market price was more than the bonds were sold for. It was not. It was just what they were sold for.

Mr. ALDRICH. I believe that a thousand millions of the bonds of the United States could upon that day have been sold by public subscription for 10 per cent more than the price which the President received.

Mr. GRAY. There is the Senator's belief again.

Mr. VILAS. If the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island had only happened to have been in the position of Secretary of the Treasury perhaps his belief would not have been so buoyant as it is when it is announced under the influence of partisan criticism. There is no justification for the proposition that the market price was a particle above what was paid, and I will prove it by the history of the negotiation. I have already called attention to the fact that the 5 per cent bonds of the United States had fallen in value until there was a loss of $3 and upward on every hundred dollars invested.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin be kind enough to suggest to the Senate why they had fallen in value?

Mr. VILAS. If what has been said here in respect to the condition of the loan last made and the way in which it was made does not explain it, it is impossible to explain it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is not the Senator from Wisconsin aware that the Administration, after having sold those bonds to certain bankers in New York, made a proposition that all the bonds which were then held as security for national-bank circulation should be put upon the market within three or four months?

Mr. VILAS. Oh, I decline to be interrupted by that sort of talk. If the statement be founded on fact, the fact had no more influence on the price of bonds as compared with the conditions which I have been exhibiting to affect that price than a zephyr would have against the north wind. I think the criticism not supported by substantial fact.

Now, I wish to go a little further into the question of price. I have shown the fall of the bonds previously issued. I ask anyone who observed the newspapers during the time if it was not the common talk in the financial centers of the country that the next loan of the United States would have to be at 8½ per cent. It was the rate generally spoken of, in recognition of the conditions which had ensued to the purchasers of the former bonds.

Mr. President, let us look at another matter. At the time when this contract was made, it was a part of its value, one of the necessary conditions, as I have shown, that the gold should come from Europe. Now, at that time, the rate of exchange was about 1 per cent against the movement of gold from Europe to the United States. It was stated in the article in the New York Tribune at 1½ per cent. Therefore if the Tribune is correct I put it moderately. At 1 per cent the persons who agree to move $32,500,000 of gold to the United States will be obliged to pay $325,000 for that loss, besides expenses of transportation. More than that they undertook practically—and that was explained in the article read yesterday—during a period of six months from the date of the contract, or from the 1st of February until the 1st of August, to maintain as far as possible a rate of exchange that would not export gold from the United States. They had to take the chances of encountering the financiers, the bankers of the world, the mischances and misfortunes that might befall any such transaction.

Of course, men abroad would not look at this without contemplating some element in the price that would cover those risks. Moreover, we were going into the markets of Europe to buy gold, and what they were willing to fix as the price for what we had to offer, we had to pay. We had to give them coin bonds, and they were not willing to pay us more gold for the coin bonds than at the rate named. We were not making a loan; we were not borrowing money; we were not simply seeking to get money into our Treasury. We were asking those men in Europe who had gold in their coffers to sell us that gold at once.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think the Secretary of the Treasury or the President would have been justified in paying $16,000,000 premium for $62,000,000 of gold which they desire to get at this time?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, whatever premium the Secretary of the Treasury was obliged to pay in order to get gold under those circumstances it was his duty to pay.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that it was necessary to pay $16,000,000 premium?

Mr. VILAS. I have not the slightest doubt of it, with the coin bonds only to offer.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose the President had—

Mr. VILAS. And if the Senator from Rhode Island, instead of standing here to carp at a transaction already completed and finished, had put himself at one end of the Atlantic cable, as the Secretary of the Treasury practically did, through and with the aid of the greatest bankers in New York, and had cabled, as was done for days, to every money market in the world, trying in every way possible to get a reduction of the rate, he would perhaps have had a different opinion himself in regard to the possibility of getting the gold at such prices as he wanted it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If I as a business man had $36,000,000 of legal-tender notes in my treasury and desired $62,000,000 of gold from Europe or anywhere else, and if I could not have secured it by the payment of less than 1 per cent premium I should have felt like retiring from business.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, it is always the misfortune of the world that the ablest men are those who are not employed to discharge its great transactions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean to say that the Secretary of the Treasury, having $86,000,000 of legal-tender notes in his possession and subject to his use, could not have bought gold in any market of the world at less than 1 per cent premium?

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Rhode Island can indulge in whatever speculation he sees fit.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin for his opinion. He is expounding this question from the Administration standpoint, and I desire to ask him whether he believes that the Secretary of the Treasury could not have obtained gold at less than 1 per cent premium if he had attempted it?

Mr. VILAS. The Secretary of the Treasury did not pay one fraction of 1 per cent premium for gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Wisconsin has just been saying that this was not a borrowing transaction; that the Secretary was not desiring to negotiate bonds, but that he desired gold to increase his reserve. I say that he could have gone into the market and obtained gold from the Bank of France, or the Imperial Bank of Germany, or the Bank of England with the legal-tender notes in the Treasury at less than 1 per cent premium, including all the expenses of the transaction.

Mr. VILAS. I do not see that the opinion the Senator from Rhode Island may hold on that subject affects it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Gold is not at a premium in any country of the world as compared with the notes of the United States.

Mr. VILAS. I do not mean the slightest disrespect for the Senator's opinion when I say it does not make a particle of difference. The Secretary of the Treasury was not equipped with his judgment or opinion or with his help. The Secretary of the Treasury stood in the face of a disaster impending upon the country so imminent that from the black thunder cloud the lightning stroke was almost ready to descend. Was he, under such circumstances, to delay more days before he concluded this transaction lest there should be a fraction of a cent per cent somewhere that he could have saved? There are times in the history of nations, in peace not less than in war, when great consequences to a people depend upon instant, prompt action, and he whose arm is palsied or whose judgment flinches or quivers from decision under such circumstances is not worthy to be intrusted with high power.

I, sir, am one of those who believe that we owe a debt to the Secretary of the Treasury and the President and his Cabinet for assuming under the conditions in which they were placed to take the action they did, aware as they must have been that they would be held up afterwards to every criticism and charge that partisanship could aim against them. Sir, I am handed to read what even the New York Tribune says in an article read yesterday, and I repeat it, it is so direct, for it serves to show that other men, even in the party of which the Senator from Rhode Island is such an able and distinguished leader and representative, hold different opinions:

No plan that did not provide for getting gold from Europe, and that did not also provide means to check shipments of gold to Europe, could give the Treasury one dollar of permanent relief. This undertaking to change the whole course of exchange must necessarily be expensive, but the syndicate can do it, and the Treasury is accordingly benefited.

Mr. ALDRICH. The note read by the Senator from Wisconsin is not the language used by the New York Tribune, but is a quotation from a statement furnished by the syndicate in justification of their sale of gold to the Government at this price. It is a semi-official statement furnished the newspapers, and the Tribune published it as a matter of news, as all the other papers did.

Mr. GRAY. The Tribune indorsed it, if the Senator will read the rest of the article.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no indorsement of it. I will read what the Tribune says about it:

The work that the Belmont-Morgan syndicate will have to accomplish in order to control the foreign exchange market so that rates will be kept below the gold-exporting point is explained in the following paragraphs, which were obtained from a member of the syndicate and circulated by a financial news agency.

Mr. GRAY. Does not that give the judgment of the New York Tribune that the transaction is explained by that statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. If that is a justification and a commendation the language is certainly not very emphatic nor very definite.

Mr. GRAY. Explanation and justification are two different things.

Mr. VILAS. A word now in respect to the history of the negotiation. I called attention to the fact that on Thursday, the 31st day of January, announcement was made in the papers of New York that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Curtis, was in that city engaged in negotiations with a syndicate representing foreign bankers. From that time on until the 8th day of February, when the contract was signed, that negotiation was in progress. During that period of time, from the beginning of it, cablegrams were sent to Europe, to London, Paris, Brussels, Berlin, Vienna, to every seat of the great money exchanges of Europe.

Invitation was extended to every source from which it was thought possible that gold might be obtained. They were asked to take the 5 per cent bonds and name what possible price was the lowest that would be received. They refused those bonds. They were asked to name it in the 4 per cent bonds. The answer came, and it came without exception from four or five different cities—there was no underbid—that the 4 per cent bonds of the Government so computed as to make an interest of 3½ per cent was the lowest price that would be accepted for their gold.

Now, Mr. President, that was resisted—resisted, perhaps, because there was a belief entertained, such as the Senator from Rhode Island so freely expressed as his own, that there might be better terms achieved by longer continuance. It resulted as has already been shown. The press knew it, and the result of what was called a "hitch" in the negotiations instantly affected the market and renewed the run on the Treasury, although moderately. It seemed for a time that they were to be interrupted. It was feared, let me say, that, in the language of one of the bankers, the United States had already overstayed its time, and that it was too late to save the country from specie suspension. That entered into the element of price. Finally, on the 7th day of February, it was demanded, as a last attempt on the part of the United States, that the price should be 3½, which was refused. They would not furnish the gold for less than 3½.

Mr. ALDRICH. Was that proposition submitted to anybody except to Mr. Belmont and Mr. Rothschild?

Mr. VILAS. Oh, it was submitted to the great money kings of Europe.

Mr. TELLER. There was no such submission whatever.

Mr. VILAS. In respect to this matter I am giving information which was furnished me directly from one who participated in the negotiation and whose word I believe implicitly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator how then the bonds are worth 112 now?

Mr. VILAS. I will come to that in one moment and I think I shall make it perfectly plain. There was no man engaged in that transaction who did not desire to help the credit of the United States. The nature of the transaction was, one element of chiefest value was, that the Treasury of the United States did engage by the nature of the contract the aid of the great financiers of Europe to the support of the credit of the United States. What did they take those bonds for? To hoard? As is the way of their trade, they took those bonds to sell again. They are to be delivered from month to month during the six months of the performance of that contract; of course with allowance of interest during that time. They are thus to make their profit to compensate them for the cost of the shipment of gold to the United States, for holding the rate of exportation favorable to us, for all the risks and labor they undertake, they are to make their profit in the price at which they will sell their bonds to others.

Is it to be supposed that the United States were to go to Rothschild & Sons in London, or to the great bankers represented by Morgan & Co., of New York, and implore them to perform as a patriotic duty to the United States what her Representatives in Congress had failed to do? No. The Government of the United States was obliged to go to these bankers to buy gold, and it had to deal with them according to the exigencies of the situation. Of course it could not have been expected on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury that these bankers should not sell their bonds for more than they received. If they sold them for 109½ it would but pay a rate of interest equivalent to what other bonds of the United States were bearing, just about that. They would then have made but 5 per cent on the transaction as against the expenses of the shipment of gold, as against all the risks, as against all the necessary profits which such a transaction involved.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why does the Senator say these bonds would have sold at 109 if they had sold at the same rate other bonds of the United States were selling? On the day that transaction was made the fours of 1907, with twelve years to run, were selling at 110 to 110½. If these bonds had been sold at the same rate of interest, considering the length of time they had to run, they would have sold for 119 instead of 104½.

Mr. VILAS. That is a mere assertion on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is an assertion capable of mathematical demonstration.

Mr. VILAS. It is an assertion. It is a mere opinion as to what those bonds were worth. The bonds which had been previously purchased from the United States under former loans had depreciated after they were purchased. Every banker who bought at either of the two former sales had met a loss if he had not first sold his bonds, and then the holder had. Of course, with the conditions in Congress the investment was a speculation, and necessarily so. The Secretary of the Treasury was not to blame for the fact that it was speculative. The result to their price depended on future contingencies. The bonds might fall as others had. It was one of the advantages of the transaction that the aid of great financiers was surely engaged to elevate our credit.

But, Mr. President, the Senator says the bonds have risen in value. I certainly hope they have. Let me say to him that other bonds have risen in value. All the bonds of the United States have appreciated since this transaction. The credit of the United States has ascended also.

Mr. ALDRICH. There has been no change, practically, in the quotation of bonds in the New York market or the London market since this contract was made.

Mr. VILAS. I think the Senator will find that he is mistaken; that they have risen from 1 to 1½ per cent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the price of fours has gone up because these bonds were sold at such a discount?

Mr. VILAS. These bonds were not sold at a discount. They were used to purchase gold at the best market price of the gold at that time in such bonds. It is a mere play upon words.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But were they not sold at 104.49?

Mr. VILAS. What is known in respect to the details of the transaction need not be repeated continually. Of course they were sold at 104½; that is to say, that was the price fixed as corresponding to a certain price fixed per ounce of gold; but the transaction was in every particular just what the statute authorized, a purchase of the gold coin.

Mr. President, one word in reference to this matter that was called to my attention in part by what the Senator from Ohio read yesterday. With whom were we dealing in this contract? With the house of August Belmont & Co. and with the house of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. The house of August Belmont & Co. for many and many a year has been backed in this country by the great banking house of Rothschild & Sons in London. The house of August Belmont & Co., headed then by the distinguished and able father of the present worthy son of the same name, stood by the people of this country in their time of great trouble; and also after the war, when we needed gold from Europe, the Secretary of the Treasury contracted with August Belmont & Co. to bring it to us from Europe. On the other hand its coadjutor in the negotiation, the partner of that house it might be said, was J. Pierpont Morgan & Co.

Who is Mr. Morgan? One of the foremost Republican financiers in the United States, a liberal and generous contributor, I have heard, to the campaign fund that was used to attempt to defeat the election of the present Executive in 1892, a leader in his party. I mention the fact only to show that in this whole business it was not politics, it was business, that the Secretary of the Treasury was conducting. He was not striving to make any political transaction, to get any political advantage. He was applying to the leading financiers of this country who are supported by the great houses of the world, and he had both sides to assist him in the transaction of business. He was dealing, sir, with as honorable men, as just, as upright, as trustworthy men in finance as this world knows. But, sir, it was business that was to be conducted; it was a necessity to be met, and the only available means were taken to meet it.

Mr. President, with what credit shall they be heard to criticise the terms of this contract who refuse to the people of the United States the saving of $16,174,770 reserved to be saved in it at the option of the Congress of the United States? If a bond was worth but 3 per cent interest, if we ought to have paid but 3 per cent, why did we not accept the proffer at 3 per cent? How is it that men stand here to complain that the Secretary of the Treasury has sold a bond at 84 per cent, when but for their refusal to accept the terms secured it would have been at 3 per cent? Is it to be believed that the people of the United States, realizing the exigency in which the Administration was placed, are going to condemn them at the hands of critics of that character, who refuse these very millions that were stipulated for the benefit of the United States, as a privilege to be enjoyed at their option?

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to call to the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island the remark he made a while ago in reference to the article that was read by me yesterday from the New York Tribune, and which is found in the Post? He said that that was an explanation given by a prominent banker connected with the syndicate and did not express the views of the Tribune.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said there was no evidence that it did in the paper itself.

Mr. GRAY. Since then the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] has handed me a clipping from an editorial in the Tribune of Sunday, which, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will read for the benefit of the Senate and the Senator from Rhode Island. This is the editorial:

"SOME RESULTS."

The first effect of the bond transaction has been to put a premium on gold. By this one fact light is cast both on the expenses which the syndicate has undertaken to meet and on the probable effect of its operations upon the Treasury reserve. In order to get together the gold to be sold for bonds, the syndicate has to buy gold in open market here or abroad, and to pay a premium, which increases the cost of the bonds. It has also to regulate the market for foreign exchange, and to that end is liable at any time to be compelled to sell exchange at prices below those of other bankers, thus sustaining a loss which has also to be charged as part of the cost of the bonds. No doubt the able bankers who are in charge calculated on these and other losses and risks in fixing a price which they hoped would in the end bring them a profit, but it is only right to have in mind these with other items of the cost of replenishing the Treasury by such a process.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I shall not occupy any more time in respect to the price of the bonds, except simply to refer to an observation of the Senator from Colorado who the other day quoted the price of bonds of some other countries, and concluded that the price at which our bonds were negotiated was lower, or the rate of interest was higher than that obtained in some other countries.

Mr. President, but a very few years ago, when the present Executive was in the same seat of office before, there was no country on the face of the earth whose credit rose higher than that of the United States under his Administration. If it be true that since that time, in the few years which have passed, the United States can not obtain money in Europe as cheaply as Egypt can, let them answer for it who have destroyed the national credit, or rather impaired it to that degree.

It was not the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, who, since their advent to office, have been forced to stand breast deep in the surge of trouble rolling over them and the National Treasury from causes engendered before their day of service began, that have destroyed the national credit. If, indeed, Egypt can borrow for less than we, it is because Egypt gives no uncertain sound in the honest promise she makes to pay. The United States can go into Europe to-day and borrow as cheaply as any country in the world, but if we will compete with others we have got to say in our words of promise what they say; we must offer to pay in money which all the world knows to be good, dollar for dollar and cent for cent, with the promise.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I shall not interrupt the Senator again, but I wish to ask him this question: If it be true, as the Senator has stated, that other Governments can borrow money cheaper by agreeing to pay in gold, and we have to pay more because our securities are payable in coin, will not the Government of the United States be entirely justified in paying these particular bonds in silver or the money which is cheapest?

Mr. VILAS. Oh, no. Mr. President, I am astonished that the Senator from Colorado would even ask a question which I know he never would answer in the affirmative.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Did we not pay this enormous premium for this option? If not, for what did we pay it?

Mr. VILAS. We paid it because we had discredited to that degree our own promise.

Mr. WOLCOTT and Mr. TELLER. How?

Mr. VILAS. We had discredited it by casting a fear upon it, a fear in the money markets of the world in respect to the money of payment. To illustrate that, this very contract contains the agreement that if we would simply say "gold" we should have that money at 3 per cent flat.

Mr. President, notwithstanding these bankers manifest a shade of fear over their confidence, yet they have trusted us. Does the Senator from Colorado, does any man in the world, believe that they would have trusted us with this $65,000,000 if they deemed it possible that the United States could return to them silver instead of gold? They had the word of the United States in this contract, given by the Executive so far as he could give it; they had it written in the statutes of the United States requiring always gold for loans; they had it in the statutes of the United States declaring it the established policy to maintain the parity of the two metals; they had it in the unblemished history of the United States through all the course of its years of honor.

Mr. President, I have heard criticisms of the fifth and last clause in the contract, which provides:

Fifth. In consideration of the purchase of such coin, the parties of the second part, and their associates hereunder, assume and will bear all the expense and inevitable loss of bringing gold from Europe hereunder; and, as far as lies in their power, will exert all financial influence and will make all legitimate efforts to protect the Treasury of the United States against the withdrawals of gold pending the complete performance of this contract.

I have heard that criticised. I think the Senator from Massachusetts said that that was for the United States to ask Rothschild & Sons to assist in maintaining our credit, and it was a dreadful thing to do.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin refer to me?

Mr. VILAS. No; it was the Senator's colleague [Mr. HOAR] of whom I was speaking.

I have already pointed out in the tables introduced that when the former loans were made there were drawn out in both instances a very large share of the gold which was to be loaned from the Treasury itself. So, instead of deriving relief to the extent of the contract, the Treasury got not more than half of the relief stipulated, and perhaps not so much as that in the last instance.

In this case the contract provides within itself that it shall take six months to execute it. Would it have been anything but reprehensible in the Secretary of the Treasury not to have stipulated with these parties, in the light of his former experience, that they should not withdraw gold from the Treasury itself in order to execute the contract; that, on the contrary, they should assist to protect the Treasury in the benefits which the Treasury was contracting for? That mere suggestion answers all there is of such a criticism, and I pass from that.

Another point of criticism much insisted upon arises on that portion of the contract which provides that:

Second. Should the Secretary of the Treasury desire to offer or sell any bonds of the United States on or before the 1st day of October, 1895, he shall first offer the same to the parties of the second part; but thereafter he shall be free from every such obligation to the parties of the second part.

That was only a fair, a just consideration to the men who were purchasing this gold. This contract provided that they should not be required to deliver the last of the gold until August next. They would not receive the last installment of bonds until the last installment of the gold was delivered. They had seen the United States driven to new bonds within almost two months of a former sale, and the price of the bonds had gone down within two months of the sale. If the United States should, therefore, put into the market, in competition with the bonds they offered, a new issue of bonds, they might depreciate the market.

They asked only for two months after they had received the last installment of their bonds for an opportunity to sell them, or to give the United States at least as much for the bonds which might thereafter be sold as they could receive from anybody else, their purpose being necessarily to protect themselves in the market from a depreciation of the bonds they had purchased and which they had but two months to sell. It was a stipulation to guarantee the price of future bonds, not to lower it.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], in his usual eloquent and captivating fashion, assailed the President of the United States a day or two ago, and criticised the action taken because the price of the bonds was too low, and also because this was an attempt not to improve but to blacken our credit, to use his own words, I recognized that it was not unnatural, in the ardor of feeling for the cause which he has so long espoused, and with so much power and zeal, that he should be somewhat intemperate in the language he employed to criticize one who had done so much to prevent the country from going to the silver basis; but when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] followed the Senator from Colorado, and again insisted upon the self-same points of objection which the Senator from Colorado had urged, only intensifying his language by using the superlative, I was not prepared to think so charitably of his phrase.

The Senator from Massachusetts represents a portion of the country which is as deeply interested in the maintenance of gold payments as any portion of the United States, a section of the country which as cordially upholds, I verily believe, in the hearts of all the people as in all its financial institutions, the action which the Secretary of the Treasury has taken as any other. He did not justify that portion of the people of this country when he, recognizing the duty to maintain gold payments, spoke of this contract, so necessary to that result, as the blackest public contract ever made. In what was it black? In no points of his suggestion black, save only what he iterated after the Senator from Colorado.

It is no blacker contract than those objections make it, if well taken. But they would not, if true, make it a black contract. If the price paid were high there would be no justification for calling it "black." If the price were inadequate criticism of the wisdom of the contract depends upon the circumstances under which it was made, and which I have tried to explain, as sufficient to justify whatever was necessary to make it.

I shall not detain the Senate much longer. I have already consumed much more time than I supposed would be necessary, but there is one feature of this contract to which I must make a passing and brief allusion.

Criticism has been made—I do not think I remember to have heard any member of the Senate do himself the discredit of making it here, but elsewhere it has been urged—that Mr. Stetson was concerned in this contract, and that Mr. Stetson was at one time a partner of the President in the profession of the law. Mr. Stetson is the head of the great law firm of Stetson, Bangs, Lynde & MacVeagh—if I give the names in their proper order—in New York.

One of the members of that firm is, I am informed—I know nothing more of it—a relative of Mr. Morgan, but, whatever the fact in that respect is, the firm has been for some time the ordinary legal advisers of the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Company. When this bargain was concluded, for the first time in its history Mr. Stetson, as the lawyer of the banking house, was called in to overlook the legal sufficiency of its formal enrollment and execution, simply to see that it was done in such manner as the law authorizes and would support in order to maintain the interest of his clients, and for no other purpose, and of course, as he was present at its conclusion, he signed his name as a witness.

This simple statement of facts is all that ought to be made. If it had not been that the thing has been the subject of the reckless tongue of slander, which loves to deal with great names, it should not have been mentioned here at all.

Mr. President, I introduced a bill here some days since in the hope that it might receive consideration. We need not say why it has not; and yet I think the bill which I introduced, fairly considered, requires no surrender of any principle or opinion in respect of the financial policy of the United States. It avoids every theory, every other plan or scheme of relief; it is addressed to the particular transaction already consummated in the contract by the Secretary of the Treasury, and, in words directly taken from the statutes of the United States, by which that transaction was authorized, and under which it proceeds, it simply proposes to transform the bonds to be issued from bonds at 4 per cent, payable in coin, to bonds at 8 per cent, payable in gold coin, with otherwise all and the same consequences.

It deals with no theory; it simply seeks to secure to the people of the United States the utmost possible saving in the circumstances in which the Treasury is placed by the agreement. The condition is inevitable, and no matter what opinion anyone may have of the contract it is surely to be carried out. Therefore, an opportunity was presented, on the one hand, to save to the people of the United States $16,000,000 and upward, or, on the other, needlessly to lose it.

Mr. President, in what possible contingency alone can the United States regain that particular loss which has been inflicted upon the people by the refusal of Congress to authorize the bonds to be made at 8 per cent payable in gold coin, instead of 4 per cent payable in coin? In the one sole contingency that the United States shall repay to the holders of these bonds thirty years hence, with the interest from time to time, money less valuable than gold, and less valuable than gold by more than $16,000,000. There is no other possibility of escape from it.

But, sir, we are not asking or receiving money less valuable than gold. We demand specifically gold, not money less valuable, and can it be that any Senator of the United States could contemplate as possible, much more that he could calculate coolly, upon such an act of national dishonor and shame as that this country would force upon its creditors money less valuable than that which we receive; that we would compel the discharge of a debt for less than we took? I know it can not be possible. I know that no man in this Chamber would in sober judgment avow such a thing. To none should it be imputed. I wish not to debate what debate can only weaken, rather than strengthen. Yet, if in any quarter it shall be thought possible, let the great facts of our history be recalled.

When our forefathers, in comparative poverty, exhausted by seven long years of war with the greatest power which earth could send against them, took their first great step of character and policy in national finance under their new formed Government, what was it? To assume at their full face obligation all debts of every State which had been contracted in defense of independence, regardless of the hard terms of their origin, their depreciated market value, of all the sophistries or reasons which might support the gain of their dishonor, and the nation paid them all in full, to its honor and glory.

Again, sir, when the trials, the charges, and burdens of our late civil war had stripped our people so largely of the gathered fruits of years, and piled what seemed such a mountain weight of debt upon our backs, in the very hour of its heaviest oppression, this Congress responded to the patriotic pride of our citizens with the act of 1869, to declare that the public debt should be paid in the best money known to the civilized world, glorifying our national honor, our national good faith, and unflinching integrity.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to call his attention to the fact that the public-credit act of 1869 provided for the payment of the debt in coin, exactly as our bonds call for?

Mr. VILAS. The public-credit act of 1869 did just what I said. It promised to pay the bonds of the United States in the best money known to the civilized world.

Mr. TELLER. Coin. That is what it promised.

Mr. VILAS. It was coin then indiscriminately. To pledge it now in coin and mean silver when you borrow gold is to ruin and destroy the public credit.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like—

Mr. VILAS. I decline to be further interrupted. I am already weary with the time I have been on the floor, and I desire to finish.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to be interrupted.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not desire to take any time. I merely wish to ask one question. I would ask the Senator if he is aware of a concurrent resolution which passed both Houses of Congress authorizing the payment of bonds in silver as well as in gold. Is he familiar with the fact?

Mr. VILAS. Oh, Mr. President, I do not want to stop—

Mr. SQUIRE. That is the concurrent resolution which was passed in 1878.

Mr. VILAS. I do not want to stop to discuss the details of a transaction the whole substance and effect of which was to declare the public faith of the United States pledged to pay in the best money then known to the world.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to be interrupted.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Washington can have the floor in a very few moments.

Mr. President, it is perhaps no time now, in the circumstances in which we are placed, to draw comparisons with other nations of the world. But let it be said, sir, for the people of the United States that they love their honor as they prize their liberty, and their sober judgment has never tolerated, it never will tolerate, the national reproach of the least equivocation in the nation's dealings with its creditors. That gentleman never lived, however high bred, honorable, and chivalrous, whose sense of honor and of shame was keener, higher, more sensitive than the public opinion of the freemen of America when challenged to activity by any question of its integrity. It sometimes takes great pain to awaken the quiet slumbering public opinion of the United States, not easily aroused to express itself, but in conclusion upon every great topic the public judgment of the people of the United States may be trusted for a sure result.

Sir, high in the heavens our country in its very youth flung out the declaration of its policy in national finance, blazoning like the cross in the clouds of Constantine's vision, in the words of good faith and honor; there it has since remained, there still it stands as yet undimmed, unsullied. And by that sign, sir, we have conquered—conquered our way in the world in all the peaceful struggle for supremacy, risen in rank, in power, in consideration, until now no nation looks down upon us from higher rank. Is it to be believed that the people of the United States will, for the gain of defrauding this particular creditor, now descend, in degradation, that scale of national place and honor?

Sir, thirty years must pass before these bonds shall come due, and upon another generation will rest the duty to maintain the unbroken faith and honor of our country. I have an implicit faith in that generation, sure that this is to be a rising, not a sinking world. But, sir, if, as must be thought possible, in order to reject for the gain of our country the privilege reserved in this contract, it lies in her future to return to her creditor less than was received, if indeed this great nation shall become capable of so debauching the national credit, repudiating good faith and defiling national honor, and so is to sink from its great place in the forefront of earth's family of States, I for one may thank God that I have not to live to see her shame.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech. I simply rose to refer to a matter which I intended to introduce by way of colloquy during the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] on the question of the payment of United States bonds. I merely wish to make the point that the claim on the part of the bondholders that it would be dishonest or discreditable to pay the bonds in silver is without foundation. The bondholders can not claim ignorance, as a concurrent resolution was passed by both Houses of Congress expressly declaring that all bonds payable in coin should be paid in gold or silver at the option of the Government.

The concurrent resolution was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, and passed on January 25, 1878, by a vote of yeas 42, nays 20. It was passed by the House of Representatives on January 28, 1878, by a vote of yeas 189, nays 79. Thus we see that by more than a two-thirds vote in each branch of Congress, the policy of the Government, at least so far as relates to the lawmaking power, was distinctly declared in this concurrent resolution. This was done after a full and fair discussion, lasting through many days, and there is no reason to suppose, so far as I have ascertained, that the executive department of the Government was not in full sympathy with the Congress of the United States on this subject. The relations between Stanley Matthews and President Hayes certainly were most intimate, and were known to be intimate.

I have in my hand the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I send it to the desk and ask that the preamble and resolution as adopted be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,' to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Mr. SQUIRE. As I said before, I did not rise to make a speech. I merely wish to make one remark. That the concurrent resolution was adopted by both Houses of Congress is a plain indication that it was the intention of the Government to give the bondholders to understand that they could be paid in either silver or gold dollars at the option of the Government.

While I have listened with great interest to the eloquent and forcible speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], for whom I have great personal admiration, I may be allowed, without discourtesy, to say to him and the Senate that I believe the document just read is a full and complete answer to his entire argument, and no further words are needed in reference to the subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. I may be mistaken, but I think I am not, in the statement that the Government of the United States never dared to offer payment of a single war bond in silver.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the controversy of this debate for the last two or three days has drifted and surged backward and forward over the wounded body of our national credit. I shall not enter into that controversy. I shall not inquire as to who has been responsible for the wounds inflicted upon our national credit. I desire, however, to make some remarks in reference to the pending bill, and I think it may not be amiss to call the attention of the Senate back from the somewhat heated and, indeed, acrimonious controversy which it has been engaged in as to the responsibility for the sad collapse of our financial system.

The bill was introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] on the 23d of January, 1895. It was referred on that day to the Committee on Finance. It was reported on the 12th of February, only seven days ago. As originally introduced it provided in the first section that authority be given the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of the United States to the amount of $500,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and to mature in thirty years from date, redeemable at the option of the Government after twenty years.

The second section provided that national banks might issue circulating notes to the par value of United States bonds deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the tax on circulation should be reduced to one-quarter of 1 per cent.

The third section provided that the national banking associations should not retire the whole or any part of their circulation without written authority from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The fourth section provided that hereafter national banking associations desiring to retire the whole or any part of their circulating notes shall, if so required by the Secretary of the Treasury, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States gold coin equal to the amount of notes to be retired, and each of the banking associations should at all times keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, in gold coin, a sum equal to 5 per cent of its outstanding circulating notes, and the same to be held and used for the redemption of those notes.

The fifth section declared that not exceeding one-half of the lawful reserves on account of deposits now required by law to be kept by national banking associations might consist of bonds of the United States issued under the proposed act.

The sixth section provided that national bank notes should not be issued of a less denomination than $10.

The seventh section provided for the use of silver certificates of a less denomination than $10.

The eighth section provided for the redemption and cancellation of United States legal-tender notes, whenever and as fast as the aggregate circulation of United States legal-tender notes, Treasury notes, silver certificates, and national bank notes should be in excess of the aggregate amount of United States notes, Treasury notes, national bank notes, and silver certificates in circulation at the date of the passage of the act.

But when the report is made, Mr. President, all those provisions disappear from the bill. It does not provide for the issuing of any bonds. No provisions are in it relating to the circulation of national banks. There are no provisions relating to the retirement or cancellation of United States notes. None of the provisions which were important features of the bill at the time when it was proposed as the financial measure of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and the parties whom he represented, or was supposed to represent, are retained in the bill except section 9. That, and that alone, is now reported favorably by the committee. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive at any United States mint, from any citizen of the United States, silver bullion of standard fineness, and coin the same into silver dollars of 412½ grains each. The seigniorage on the said bullion shall belong to the United States, and shall be the difference between the coinage value thereof and the market price of the bullion in New York on the day the deposit is made, and all expenditures for coinage done under the provisions of this act shall be paid out of said seigniorage; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the depositors of such bullion standard silver dollars equal in amount to the price thereof as aforesaid; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued thereon, in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. PLATT. That section translated into English means and provides for this, that any owner of silver bullion may sell it to the United States at its market price, receiving for it silver dollars or certificates issued upon the silver dollars; that the United States shall make a profit, as it is called, upon its purchase, of the difference between the market value and the coinage value of the silver which it purchases. There is no limitation as to the amount of silver which may thus be presented to the United States for purchase.

To illustrate its working: It may be supposed that a man has $1,000 worth of silver bullion at the market rate. He can bring it to the United States mint and receive for it a thousand dollars in silver certificates, and as the market rate now is about 50 per cent of the coinage value the United States will, after having paid him for it, have what it can coin into silver dollars for another thousand dollars. So the United States pays him a thousand dollars for it, and has silver enough on hand to coin another thousand dollars which shall belong to the Government. That is the plain English of the proposition of the ninth section of the bill.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me to submit a conference report?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

INCOME RETURNS FOR 1894.

Mr. VEST submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 273) extending from March 1, 1895, to April 15, 1895, the time for making returns of income for the year 1894, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the words "ordinary repairs" and insert "shall be deducted," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment inserting at the end of the amendment the following:

"And returns or reports of the names and salaries of employees shall not be required from employers unless called for by the collector in order to verify the returns of employees."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title to said joint resolution 273, and agree to the same.

G. G. VEST.

STEPHEN M. WHITE,

W. B. ALLISON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

BENTON McMILLIN,

A. B. MONTGOMERY,

A. J. HOPKINS,

Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. VEST. It is possibly necessary to make a brief statement in regard to the effect of this agreement.

In the first place, that portion of the joint resolution of the House which extended the time for making returns under the income-tax law to April 15 has been agreed upon.

In the second place, the first of the Senate amendments, which required that fire insurance and necessary repairs upon real estate should not be included in the returns of the taxpayer, has been modified to this extent, that the taxpayer now under the conference report is not required to return the amount of any fire insurance either upon real or personal property or any necessary repairs either upon real estate or upon personal property.

The next amendment, as the Senate will recollect, refers to the language of the law, which requires that where a corporation has paid taxes upon the dividends allowed to stockholders then the individual taxpayer is not required to make a return as to those dividends. The Senate amended the present income-tax law so that the word "paid" was changed to the words "to be liable for," and under the report where the corporation is now liable for the dividends, whether they are actually paid or not, the individual taxpayer is not required to include that in his return.

The next important amendment was an addition to the second amendment of the Senate, which does away with the requirement of the law to the effect that all corporations shall return a list of their salaried employees, with the names of the employees, the amount of the salary, and the addresses of the employees. That provision is modified to this extent, that a corporation is not now required to make these returns unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue requires the return in order to verify the individual statements or returns of the employees. This amendment is proper, because in the bill as it originally came to the Senate from the other House it will be remembered that the corporations themselves paid the tax upon all dividends and upon the salaries of all employees and deducted the amount from the dividends and the salaries. The Senate changed that provision of the bill as it came from the House, and provided that every individual employee should return his own salary and pay his own tax.

The last amendment made by the Senate to the joint resolution was in regard to the questions which under the regulations of the Internal Revenue Bureau are prescribed to be asked of the taxpayer. The House conferees refused peremptorily to accede to this amendment, and we were compelled to agree with the House in its action. The collectors will ask such questions as the law permits.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator himself whether after more full examination and scrutiny the Senator believes that those questions would be so troublesome as was at first indicated by the course of the debate here? I know for myself that while it seemed to me that there ought to be no questions asked until the return was under suspicion, on examining more fully the questions themselves it occurred to me that it might perhaps be fully as well that the taxpayer should have the opportunity of answering the questions at first, and thereby close the matter and not be open to general questioning afterwards. So for one I have given up my opposition to those questions.

Mr. VEST. That was the conclusion to which the conferees on the part of the Senate came after consultation with the House conferees. We have no doubt that in any case where the taxpayer honestly desires to make a return and to pay the tax due there will be no oppression and very little annoyance by reason of the questions. I do not know that as an original proposition I would have formulated these questions as they come now from the Internal Revenue Bureau; but as a matter of course the law is a new one, in a great many of its details at any rate, and there will be more or less friction here and there in regard to its operation. But the conferees on the part of the House were so determined on this point that we thought it better under all the circumstances to give them the benefit of any doubt, and to make the report as it stands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the joint resolution as the Senate amended it, and I understand now from the Senator that the Senate amendment as to prohibiting the asking of questions is receded from. But I do not understand (perhaps because I listened inattentively) what other concessions from the Senate amendments the Senate conferees have made. Will the Senator state that again?

Mr. VEST. They made none. The House conferees acceded to all the amendments of the Senate except the amendment in regard to questions.

Mr. CHANDLER. All the Senate amendments are agreed to except that one?

Mr. VEST. Yes; they are modified to some extent, but they are substantially as the Senate agreed to them, and in fact one of them is enlarged.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is, the deductions of the first amendment are enlarged?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, there is no complaint to be made of the Senate conferees so far as their action relates to the first two amendments. I am inclined to believe that the verbal amendments which they have made (they are in fact more than verbal amendments; the substantial amendments which they have made) have improved the joint resolution and improved the amendments which the Senate placed upon the House joint resolution. The objection arises to the last amendment from which the Senate conferees have wholly receded.

I do not intend to enter upon the argument again. The Senate seemed to be entirely unanimous upon the point that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had no right to ask these questions in the original return. Nearly every lawyer in the Senate so asserted; and it was explained that the questions had inadvertently crept into the form of return established by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, taking them, it was said, as an excuse for action, from the old forms and returns under the old war income tax, and that they would not be insisted upon. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in excusing the action of the previous conference committee, endeavored to exculpate the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and made the broad statement that in future returns the Commissioner of Internal Revenue assured the Senate that those blanks would be changed. The only objection that he urged was that he had the blanks printed, that it would be an expense of some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to reprint them, and that it ought to be avoided.

Mr. President, upon the faith of that statement or statements, equally as conclusive, the Senate concluded to allow the questions to remain. Then when the joint resolution came up the Senate, with great propriety in my judgment, insisted upon having the amendment placed upon the joint resolution where it was clearly germane and could not be disposed of by any point of order. Hence we inserted a clause in the amendment that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or the Collector, acting through him, should not have a right to ask any questions in the original return; that the taxpayer should simply make a statement of the various items of income, and the various items of deductions claimed, and that was all. That the income-tax law provides for nothing else is clear. That these questions are illegal is clear, and they will lead to litigation. The Senator from Ohio in his speech on the first conference report, said openly that he should refuse to answer them, and that every other Senator was at liberty to do the same. Every taxpayer can follow his example.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that we might have insisted upon this elimination; that we might have determined that those questions should not be insisted upon; that we should not put the people of the country in peril by reason of having them insisted upon in these returns. As I said, the first argument put forth was that they crept in inadvertently. Then a resolution was passed asking the Secretary of the Treasury by what authority they were placed in. He reversed the position of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and made the broad statement that they were so inserted and insisted upon because they were based upon the general provisions of the income-tax law. He pointed out no specific provision. He did not attempt to define that it could be done under the power to make forms and regulations, and thereby claim that he had a right to ask the questions, but he based it simply upon the broad power that was given by the income-tax law.

Now, Mr. President, what will be the practical effect? Some will answer them and some will not. Citizens who are not willing to accept the dangers of litigation will have to answer them. Other citizens who do not care and are willing to incur the displeasure of the collector can refuse to answer at their peril. If they refuse to answer the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the collector can place a penalty of 50 per cent upon them. We leave the taxpayer subjected to this standing peril all the while.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this provision of the law will stand. I believe that under the decision of The People vs. Boyd, in the one hundred and sixteenth Supreme Court Reports, it will be held that the only object of the questions is for the purpose of paving a way by virtual examination under oath of the citizen to incur a penalty, and that under that decision there is no power to enforce the questions. But, nevertheless, the citizen is subjected to this penalty, and he must apply to the courts of the country to be relieved from it.

But, Mr. President, I retract nothing from my views which I entertained previously and which I expressed. I take the same position that I took then. I believe it is unfortunate that the House conferees insisted upon retaining these questions as the price of their consent to this very reasonable and proper extension of time in which to make returns. However, we must be practical as legislators. Many Senators here and many members of the other House, unfortunately or fortunately, have incomes. We can not return to our homes to get our books and papers before the 1st Monday of March if we desire to make accurate returns. Every member of Congress is so situated. Thousands of people are at the South, in Florida, and all the Southern States, visiting there, and they do not wish to return to the North until after the 1st Monday of March.

It is important for the business community who are not fully prepared for this law that this extension should be made. The other amendments which have been disposed of will be reasonably satisfactory. I do not think it wise to interpose any objection at this time to the approval of this conference report. The extension of time being most valuable and important I think it overshadows the other points involved. Each citizen must fight this out for himself in the courts and defend himself as best he can.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think that of all the measures which have been suggested to Congress for a larger use of silver in our currency this is the most indefensible. I do not believe that it really meets the approval of any Senator who desires the increased use of silver. We ought not to make money as a Government out of what is called seigniorage. The provision of this bill by which the Government of the United States is to pay for the silver delivered to it, and the moment that it pays for it have it worth twice as much as it was in the hands of the seller, is not a seigniorage. Calling it seigniorage in the bill does not make it seigniorage.

Seigniorage, as has always been understood with reference to the coinage of money, is a charge made by the Government sufficient to meet the expenses of the coinage. No Government in the world has ever, to my knowledge, attempted the making of money out of the business of coining money except the Government of the United States. It would not be tolerated, I think, anywhere else.

This so-called seigniorage, this profit of 100 per cent at the present price of silver to the Government for coining it, is entirely delusive. There is an old saying that a man can not lift himself over a fence by his boot straps. It is equally true that you can not create something out of nothing. This is an attempt on the part of the Government to create an additional value in what it purchases, by the act of purchase, equal to the value of the thing in the hands of the seller; that is, at the present price of silver bullion.

If this were a measure for the free and unlimited coinage of silver in which the seller, the holder of the silver, was to receive the coinage value of the silver when delivered to the mint, I could see how it might be supported by our friends who believe in the unlimited coinage of silver. But what object is this to them? For a silver owner in New York, or Denver, who can instantly convert his silver bullion into United States silver certificates at the market price of the bullion to take his silver to a mint, pay the charges of transportation to realize upon it, and then get only what he could get instantly in the markets where silver is sold, seems only an act of folly. I say, therefore, that I do not believe this bill is in any sense acceptable to our friends who desire the free and unlimited coinage of silver, where the holder is to receive the full benefit of what is called the coinage value of the silver.

The transportation to the mint, in order to get silver certificates for it, will be a matter of considerable expense and considerable annoyance to the holder of silver bullion. Suppose that he has $100,000 worth of silver bullion in New York, where there is a market for it. He can sell it there any day at the market price. He can receive pay for it in silver certificates, or in other currency of the Government, as he may desire, at its market price.

Suppose, however, that this bill passes and he wants to take to the mint $100,000 of silver bullion. What would net him $100,000 for his bullion at the mint would be a quantity of silver which would weigh, I think, somewhere about 3 tons. So that, while now he may sell it in the New York market and get his pay for it instantly, under this bill he would have to pay transportation charges upon, say, 3 tons of silver bullion to the mint, and then, if he took it away in silver dollars, he would have to pay as much more to transport it to the place where he desired to use it. If he got his certificates, to be sure he could carry them away in his vest pocket.

Therefore, I can not conceive why it is that this measure is brought forward at the close of the session, with appropriation bills pressing, and the fear beginning to be felt that they can not be properly considered and passed before the close of the session. I can not see why this measure should be brought here.

Nobody believes in it, Mr. President. The men who fear that the unlimited coinage of silver would lead to an appreciation of our gold dollar and put it at a premium do not want this measure; and the men who believe in the unlimited coinage of silver, I venture to say, do not want it except for some sentimental influence which they suppose it may exercise upon the future of the silver question.

It is not a practical measure. To find favor with Senators it is presented as a measure which apparently, in terms, on the face of it, is going to enable the Government to make 100 per cent profit upon every transaction that it makes in the purchase of silver bullion. But as I remarked a few moments ago, that will sooner or later prove delusive. All the so-called seigniorage which the Government has made in its course with relation to silver coinage has not been a real profit, but there are compensations and disadvantages which even now have equaled the apparent profit to the Government arising from the purchase of silver at one value and coining it at another value.

So if the bill should pass, Mr. President, the very pleasing fiction that by thus dealing with silver bullion the Government is making 100 per cent profit at the present price of silver will disappear. It will prove not to have been a profit at all. If the time should ever come when, by reason of the extent of its purchases of silver, gold and silver should part company as to value, and the gold dollar should become more valuable in purchasing and debt-paying power than the silver dollar, the moment that occurs, if it does occur, then it will be seen that all this supposed advantage of 100 per cent profit in the purchase of silver was not a profit after all; and the loss will fall not upon the Government, not upon the man who sold the silver to the Government, but the man who holds the coins which the Government issues in the purchase of the silver, or which it coined after having paid for the silver and used it, for other purposes.

Now, I do not say that that time will ever come. I hope it will not, for I claim to be a bimetallist.

I believe, however, Mr. President, that gold coin is good money. I wonder if we can not get an agreement with all Senators on that proposition? Sometimes I have thought that some Senators did not think that gold coin was good money, but I think when they come to consider that question we can have a consensus of opinion as to that—that gold coin is good money.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator if gold coin is any better money than silver coin, provided that gold and silver have behind them the pledge of the United States that the parity of the two metals shall be maintained?

Mr. PLATT. Well, Mr. President, I was just about to answer that interrogatory in the course of what I was saying.

I want to know if we are not all agreed upon that proposition? Whatever the contention may have been in this currency matter with all these questions of gold monometallism and silver monometallism, can we not all agree that gold money is good money? I think we may. Silver money is just as good money as gold money so long as it buys as much and pays debts to the same extent gold coin does.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say one other thing which will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. PLATT. And paper money which pays the same amount of debts and buys the same amount of property as gold coin does, being of the same denomination, is just as good while it continues to do so as the gold coin is. Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it will be convenient for the Senator from Connecticut to finish his speech to-morrow, as we evidently can not get a vote upon this proposition to-night, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that the Senator from Rhode Island, in the absence of the Senator in charge of the bill, will not now make that motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Arkansas will probably be here before the voting is concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will not take the time to take the vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. I join in the request of the Senator from Tennessee, and suggest to him to send for the Senator in charge of the bill and have him here, so that he can see that nothing is done with this bill in his absence.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator from Tennessee might have charge of the bill temporarily.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is not in charge of the bill, temporarily or otherwise; but I think it would be proper for the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw his motion until the Senator from Arkansas appears. I have sent for him, and I think he will be here in a few moments.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Rhode Island ought to withdraw his motion until the Senator from Arkansas gets here.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw my motion for the present, until the Senator from Arkansas can get here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, to return to what I was saying. Having established one proposition to which we are all agreed, and that is, that gold coin is good money and that silver coin of the same denomination is good money so long as it buys as much as gold coin, and that paper money of the same denomination is good money so long as it buys and pays the same as the gold money, the question comes whether we can maintain this parity, for the moment a silver dollar does not buy as much as a gold dollar or pay debts to the same extent as a gold dollar, or when the paper dollar does not buy as much or pay as much of debts as the gold dollar, then it is not as good money as the gold.

We have been able thus far, Mr. President, to maintain all our money at an equal debt-paying and purchasing power. We have been able thus far to have all our silver money and our paper money just as good as gold money. It is so for all uses in this country, and I do not know but I might be prepared to admit for all uses in any country—as good as our gold money; but the question is whether we are going to be able to maintain that. That is a very serious question which arises upon the consideration of this bill.

As I said, I am a bimetalist. I believe that if we could have an international agreement among the commercial nations of the world, the world could use as money all the silver which is produced in the world, without in any way impairing the value of the silver money, without any prospect of such impairment, and I have not lost hope of international bimetalism. I think we may be very much encouraged at the present time to hope that international bimetalism is a thing of the not very remote future. The Senator from Iowa who sits before me [Mr. ALLISON] was a member of the last international monetary conference. I think he must be agreeably surprised at the change of sentiment which apparently has taken place among the commercial nations of the world since the close of that conference. If I understand the condition while that conference was in progress, any agreement for the further use of silver by Germany or England seemed to be entirely hopeless; and I think the Senator from Iowa, a member of that conference, would bear me out in saying that when the commission adjourned he had practically lost hope that either then or at any other time would England or Germany ever listen to proposals for an unlimited or enlarged use of silver for coinage as money.

But, Mr. President, events move pretty rapidly. That international monetary conference closed its labors in 1893; it is now 1895; and what seemed to be impossible has apparently happened. Here within two or three days the German Reichstag has adopted by a majority vote a resolution asking Germany to move in the matter of calling another international monetary conference with reference to the use of silver as money.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. PLATT. Let me finish my sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PLATT. In a moment.

But wonder of wonders, it seems almost probable that England at no distant day will be quite willing to join in such an international monetary conference. The present ministry in England, which was in power at the time of the last monetary conference, apparently is going out of office. A dispatch in the paper of this afternoon shows that it had only eight majority upon the last vote of confidence, and that Lord Roseberry, the prime minister, has summoned hastily a council of the cabinet, and that there is every reason to believe that Parliament is to be dissolved and a new election to take place.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. PLATT. One moment, please.

If that should be so, we can not forecast what the new ministry will be, but it is generally understood, I think, in this country, that it is likely to include the names of such men as Lord Roseberry, Mr. Goschen, and Mr. Balfour, all of whom are understood to be favorable to the joining of England in an international monetary conference. So the conditions have entirely changed, and we have to-day the bright hope of those commercial nations joining with us if we are ready in some proposition to establish international bimetalism.

Now, I will listen, first, to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator says he is a bimetalist. I wish to inquire whether he would be willing to join in a bimetallic agreement without an international agreement?

Mr. PLATT. Before I get through with what I have to say I shall try to make my position plain. I will say this, though, just here in answer to the Senator from South Dakota: I think that if it shall be shown that England and Germany utterly and absolutely for all time refuse to engage with the United States in an international agreement for the enlarged use of silver, I should be willing, and would advocate, that the United States join with such commercial nations as are willing to engage in an international monetary conference for that purpose. I think that answers the Senator's question.

Now, I will hear the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he has kept account of how many times the gold combination has got out of a tight place in the silver war by raising the cry of an international conference?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada is troubled not only nights, but days as well, with this specter of a gold combination. I can not stop to answer him along that line.

Mr. STEWART. I was not asking about that. I asked how many times this promise has been held up for political purposes? When the gold party were liable to lose ground in this country they have never failed to call attention to the prospect of an international monetary conference.

Mr. PLATT. No great world-wide movement in finance ever makes progress immediately. These questions have to be settled slowly, especially if they are to embrace the sentiments and the opinions of men throughout the commercial nations of the earth. While I have despaired at times of reaching any agreement for international bimetalism, I think that the prospect now grows bright, and I do not think even the Senator from Nevada thinks that it was the gold combination which succeeded in passing that vote in the German Reichstag asking for such an international bimetallic conference.

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. STEWART addressed the Chair.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will give the Senator from Nevada a chance to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] wants to know what I think about this question of international monetary conferences. I think it is the gold combination and the gold manipulators who have got every vote and do everything to get international monetary conferences in order to obtain more time; and whenever we were invited over there it appeared to be the understanding that we should be kicked out every time. That is always a very "good Morgan" for a political campaign. Always just before a Presidential campaign is coming on we hear about an international monetary conference.

It is the same old chestnut we have heard in every campaign for a great many years. It was used in the campaign of 1892, and will be used again in the campaign of 1896.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think anyone but the Senator from Nevada, either in the Senate, or in this country, or in England, or in Germany, thinks it was the gold combination which procured that vote in the German Reichstag.

Mr. ALDRICH (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.). As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is now in his seat and it has passed the usual time for adjournment, I will renew the motion I made in his absence. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] and vote "nay." My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and will withhold my vote.

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTIGREW (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. PRITCHARD's name was called). I have been requested to announce that on the remaining votes of the day the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. ALDRICH (when Mr. SHERMAN's name was called). The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] requested me to announce that he is paired on all questions connected with this bill with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. POWER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BLANCHARD (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Michigan has not voted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am paired with that Senator, and withdraw my vote. If he were present I understand he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I transferred my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], not knowing that the Senator from South Carolina had returned to the Chamber. He is now here and has voted. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont to my colleague [Mr. BATE], who is absent for the moment, but who will be here very soon. My colleague will therefore stand paired on this vote with the Senator from Vermont, and I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PUGH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and vote "nay."

Mr. HILL. I have myself already announced a pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PUGH. Then I will transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Dakota is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], as I have already announced.

Mr. PUGH. Then I am compelled to withhold my vote, Mr. President.

Mr. PALMER (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from North Dakota has not voted.

Mr. PALMER. Then I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I transfer the pair I have with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] to my colleague [Mr. CAFFERY], who is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], which will allow the Senator from Montana and me to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. POWER. Under that arrangement I vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understood the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to say that he was paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON]. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that we transfer our pairs respectively, so that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], with whom I have a general pair, will stand paired with the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BURROWS. I should be very glad to do that, if it be proper.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I vote "nay."

Mr. BURROWS. I vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I find, on consultation, that the arrangement I made with the Senator from Michigan will not work, as I understand from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that his colleague [Mr. GIBSON] would vote "yea" if he were here. Consequently I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURROWS. Under those circumstances I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and the vote of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will be withdrawn.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I find there is an error about the transfer of pairs I announced. I desire to withdraw my vote, and announce that I stand paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN].

Mr. POWER. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to suggest that if the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] stands now unpaired, possibly that may permit a transfer of a pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—15.
Aldrich,	Chandler,	Gorman,	McPherson,
Alison,	Davis,	Hale,	Manderson,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRYE. With the permission of the Senator from Connecticut, I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] if, in view of the last vote, he thinks it is of any use to try to keep us here all night? There was just a quorum on that vote, and that was all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should be very glad to have a vote on this bill, and I hope we can have a vote very soon. There are certain Senators who are absent temporarily from the Capitol now who will be here in a few minutes, and I think there will not be the slightest difficulty about having a quorum here until such time as Senators who wish to put themselves on record shall be ready to vote on the bill, which I hope will not be beyond an hour or two. I should be glad to have an hour fixed, in order to avoid inconvenience to Senators, at which we can take the vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Say 10 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will ask unanimous consent that we vote at 10 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Ten o'clock of what day?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Ten o'clock to-night.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator expect us to sit here until 10 o'clock to-night in order to vote on this bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It being the duty of all Senators to be in the Senate when it is in session, I assume that every Senator will be in his place.

Before the Senator from Connecticut proceeds, for the purpose of being as liberal as possible with Senators who are unwilling to vote to-night and to avoid the necessity for a night session, I will ask unanimous consent that we may vote on this bill to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that he has not been present here all the time, and that there has been a long speech made here, a very able speech, a very interesting speech, which had no relation whatever to the bill, and it can hardly be expected that a bill of this character can be voted upon without some debate.

So far as I am concerned I disclaim any desire to delay the passage of this bill by filibustering methods. The Senator from Arkansas very unkindly suggested that there was some intention of that kind before a word had been said on the bill at all and before any indication had been given as to what would be the course of the opponents of the bill. The Senator seemed to think it unreasonable that he could not bring this bill forward yesterday afternoon and get a vote upon it when Senators were not here.

The vote which has just been taken shows that a large number of the opponents of the bill have gone away, not expecting that it would be voted upon to-night, and the Senator can hardly expect that the bill will be voted upon without some little debate. When reasonable debate upon the merits of the bill ends, such as is the speech of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and such as was not, I am free to admit, the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], there will be no objection to a vote being taken upon the bill.

I call the Senator's attention to another fact, that there has not been any speech made in behalf of the bill which reconciles this bill with the bill which kept us so long here some three months in 1893. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who I am glad to see in his seat, led the majority of the Senate, I being at that time his willing follower, in the repeal of the purchasing clause of what was called the Sherman silver act.

After three months that law was repealed. We were told that prosperity was to come to the country. Now, time has passed, and the Senator from Indiana stands here advocating the unlimited coinage of silver—the same Senator who thought the monthly purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion was destroying the country, ruining us all. To-day the Senator from Indiana is for the bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas, although the Senator from Indiana perhaps does not feel well, and does not lead in the advocacy of the bill, but turns it over to the Senator from Arkansas.

I really think that somebody who is in favor of the bill ought to give us some explanation of this change of front on the part of the Finance Committee. I myself am greatly puzzled. I then followed the majority of the Finance Committee. Now I am compelled to differ with the majority of the Finance Committee, and the Senator from Arkansas is not willing to have a few hours debate, but wants to force us into a vote to-night. He says the friends of the bill have no explanation to make. I think the Finance Committee ought to make some explanation of the reasons. We were kept here from August until November, with no chance to visit the World's Fair unless we abandoned our duties in the Senate, in order to remove the terrible injury to the country that was inflicted by buying 4,500,000 ounces of silver a month. Now, forsooth, the country is to be saved and prosperity is to be restored by the unlimited coinage of silver.

Now, I want to hear briefly from the Senator from Arkansas the reason why this position has been taken; and I certainly hope my good-natured friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has presided over the committee on both occasions, when both reports have been made to the Senate, and who has been upon both sides of this question, will kindly tell us what he himself thinks. I do not understand it.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PLATT. I was quite willing—

Mr. WHITE. I was not aware that the Senator from Connecticut had the floor. I desired to make an observation.

Mr. PLATT. I was quite willing to yield to any conference between Senators as to whether I should be permitted to finish my speech to-morrow rather than this evening.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Connecticut will yield to me just one moment I will state that I have made a number of efforts to have an understanding as to a time for a vote on the bill. If the Senator from New Hampshire is sincere when he says that those who are opposing the passage of the bill have no disposition to resort to dilatory tactics or to delay the passage of the bill, I propose to make another proposition. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate shall take a vote on the bill to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate take a vote on the bill at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I object, and I object for the reason I shall state, among others. I desire to supplement what has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. The bill as it was originally presented to the Senate by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] contained nine sections, all of which were important in their bearing upon the financial situation of the country. When the bill comes back from the committee it is shorn of eight sections, and only one is presented for the action of the Senate. The eight sections which are stricken out included provisions for the sale of $500,000,000 of bonds, for the retirement of legal-tender notes, and various other propositions of that kind which were understood at the time to have the Executive approval.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Arkansas is bound not only to explain the section which is presented here, but also to explain why there has been an abandonment of the other eight sections. Why is it that those eight sections which a large majority of the Democratic majority at that time thought were necessary for the salvation of the country are not as necessary now as they were then? The Senator from Arkansas, as the Senator from New Hampshire has very well said, comes in here on a matter of this importance and expects us to vote without any explanation on his part or the part of any friend of the bill as to what its purpose is.

I have heard the Senators upon this side of the Chamber and the other side who are in favor of silver say they were not in favor of treating silver as a commodity and having it purchased as merchandise. Yet here we have a proposition to commit every silver man in this body to a proposition to purchase an unlimited amount of silver as a commodity and as merchandise; and not only that, but to base the price of it upon gold. If there ever was a proposition to maintain and continue the gold standard it is contained in the pending bill.

Mr. STEWART. Does the fact that you charge a royalty make it merchandise? If it does, gold has been made a merchandise frequently, because there has been a royalty upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Sherman Act, so called, provided for the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month at the market price. The pending bill provides for the purchase at the market price of all the silver offered. The only difference is—

Mr. STEWART. And its coinage.

Mr. ALDRICH. The purchase; exactly so. I think when I have time to explain the bill I will convince even the Senator from Nevada that I am right and that this is simply a proposition for the unlimited purchase of silver and nothing else.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question? If the Senator from Arkansas will consent to modify the bill so that it shall be an out-and-out unlimited coinage of silver measure, will the Senator from Rhode Island then consent to vote upon it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will then consent to discuss that measure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is there any measure which relates to the coinage of silver that the Senator from Rhode Island will not consent to discuss?

Mr. ALDRICH. No, sir; I think not. I have never seen one.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is there any bill as to silver on which he will permit a vote?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will permit a vote on it after proper discussion. So far as I am concerned, I will permit a vote on this measure after proper discussion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask, with due deference to the Senator from Arkansas, what the Senator from Rhode Island considers proper discussion?

Mr. ALDRICH. Discussion until every Senator who has views on the subject has had time to express them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senator from Rhode Island aware of any Senator besides himself who has views to express on the subject?

Mr. ALDRICH. I tried to get a chance to speak upon the bill this afternoon, and I found seven Senators ahead of me upon the Vice-President's list.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Rhode Island has been very industrious.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senate can remain in session, I think, without difficulty until 10 o'clock this evening, which will be three hours and a half from this time. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he and the minority, those who are opposed to the bill, will consent to take a vote to-morrow at 4 o'clock. That will allow five hours' time for discussion to-morrow and three and a half hours to-night. It seems to me that would be full time for reasonable discussion.

Mr. FRYE (to Mr. PLATT). Consent to that, and then none of us will be obliged to stay here to-night to hear the discussion.

Mr. PLATT. I can not consent to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then all I have to say is that the comments made by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Rhode Island distinctly show that the minority do not intend to have a test of strength in the Senate upon this question. That is all; and of course they will delay the bill as much as they choose to bring about that result.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not said a single word to justify the remark of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PLATT. No, Mr. President; I think I will go on.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me a moment on the mere question of speaking? I will state that I visited the Vice-President's desk this afternoon to see whether there would be an opportunity for me to express my views upon the subject. I had desired to wait until to-morrow, if I could. I looked at the list and I found that a half dozen gentlemen had entered their names for speeches to be delivered this afternoon, among them both Senators from Colorado—

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. And other Senators; and I had a right reasonably to suppose that they would take the afternoon. I submit that in common fairness Senators who do not propose to speak ought not to go there and enter their names on the list and exclude others.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may interrupt the Senator from New York, I will state that I have not the slightest intention of speaking at the present time and have had none. I suspect that my name was put on the list by the Senator from Rhode Island, perhaps, as one of the seven names he saw. I assure the Senator from New York that I had not the slightest intention of speaking.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Rhode Island seems to be responsible for everything.

Mr. ALDRICH. I saw the Senator's name on the list the Vice-President had, I am free to state. I suppose the statement of the Senator from Arkansas that none of the friends of the bill would speak upon it probably precluded the Senator from Colorado from carrying out his idea.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I had not the slightest disposition to speak at any time.

Mr. HILL. I have no knowledge as to how the names got on the list. I was informed by the Vice-President that those gentlemen said they wished to speak, and they had the right of way, of course. I suggest that in the future Senators who have no idea of speaking ought not themselves to place their names on the list or allow their names to be put on the list with their consent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator from New York if he added his name to the list?

Mr. HILL. I did not, because there are six or seven ahead upon the list.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think I can inform the Senator from New York as to how the names came upon the list.

Mr. HILL. I do not know.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They were put on the list with reference to discussion on the bond resolution, not having the slightest reference to the bill brought in by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HALE. It is in the line of the pending bill.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that I intended to speak very briefly upon the bond-contract question, but I have never had any idea at all of discussing this question.

Mr. HALE. It uses up the time.

Mr. HILL. Was not the Senator's name put down?

Mr. TELLER. I supposed the Senator from Wisconsin would quit by 4 or 5 o'clock, and then I would take a few minutes. But as he did not, I concluded I would not discuss the question.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will permit me simply to make an inquiry, I desire to ask whether, in addition to the rules of the Senate, which are written or printed, there is also a common-law rule that it is necessary to put your name upon a list in order to obtain recognition? The obscurity prevailing in parliamentary interpretation here appears to be intensified as we proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from California that there is no rule governing the matter.

Mr. WHITE. That is what I supposed with reference to all the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it occurs to me that perhaps I am a little interested personally in the matter which there has been an effort to arrange in the Senate, and I wish to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he can hardly expect to bring a measure of this importance before the Senate and ask that the discussion be sat out the first night. When the Senator comes to think of it I am sure he will feel that he is crowding not only the convenience but almost the rights of Senators who desire to be heard upon the bill.

I suggested to friends yesterday that I should like to be heard on the bill to-day. I supposed I would have an opportunity by 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon and that we should have time during the rest of the afternoon for discussion upon the bill, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and very properly, took up all the time from 1 o'clock until after 5 o'clock in the discussion of the matter.

I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he had better let the Senate adjourn at a proper and reasonable time, which I think this is, and come here to-morrow and see what is the prospect of having a debate upon this bill, the most important measure, I venture to say, which has been brought before either House of Congress this session, and then see if he can get an agreement to-morrow. Of course I am making a speech to-night under great difficulties. It is hard to remember what I was saying when the interruption occurred a half hour ago. But, struggling to resume the thread of thought, I believe I was saying that I had great hope of international bimetalism.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me for a moment before he begins the thread of which he speaks.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill was taken up last evening at 6 o'clock. If any notice was given by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] that he would ask the Senate to remain here to-night until this bill was disposed of it escaped my attention.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I certainly gave it distinctly and clearly at the time the vote was taken.

Mr. STEWART. He gave it then and this morning again.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. This certainly is an important bill that we have under consideration. It relates to a question that certainly interests the people of the United States very greatly; although I agree that with the waning hours of this Congress it is important we should occupy every possible moment in the consideration of the questions we ought to consider before we adjourn. But it does seem to me that a question of this importance ought to have more time for its consideration than can be given to it to-night. If we are to have a vote by unanimous consent at any time we should have coupled with it some understanding as to how that time shall be occupied. I do not know that I will wish to engage at all in the debate. If I do, it will be but briefly.

But I submit that when a Senator takes the floor and occupies two, three, or four hours in debate, whether he confines himself strictly to the question under consideration or deals with important collateral questions, it is scarcely fair to all the other Senators that they shall be forced into a vote upon this important measure without at least one day of debate wherein an opportunity will be given to Senators to discuss the question before us. As for myself, I have been compelled, as Senators know, for a day or two, perhaps for three days, to be almost wholly absent from this Chamber.

I should like very much to have the Senator from Arkansas continue this session, if he chooses to continue it, for some little time for debate, and then adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow. So far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to stay here to-morrow if we can have a legitimate debate upon this question, in which all Senators may have an opportunity of participating, and come to a vote at a reasonable time to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Iowa designate a time?

Mr. ALLISON. I will not. I will not designate a time, because this is not the time to agree to fix an hour for the vote. Here is a question certainly as important as any question that has engaged the attention of the Senate at the present session. It is a question that engaged our attention two years ago for three months. This bill is as far reaching as that bill, and more so, as has been suggested.

Therefore, I submit in all seriousness to the Senator from Arkansas having charge of this bill that he can not expect us now to agree to a time for a vote upon the bill, and such an agreement will not be made with my consent. After a fair opportunity be given for debate I will agree that a vote may be taken upon the bill, but I will not do it to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he believes that anything any Senator on this floor may say in debate will change a single vote upon the pending question?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer that question by asking the Senator from Tennessee another. He represents here upon this floor one of the States of this Union—

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; in part.

Mr. ALLISON. In part. It may be important to him or it may be unimportant to him to express on this floor the reasons which actuate him in casting his vote for this measure or against the measure. Here is a proposition that has never yet been debated in this Chamber until to-day, and I am told that it was debated to-day in a very limited way. Whilst it may be that nothing the Senator from Tennessee may say or nothing that I may say or omit to say will change a single vote, nevertheless we have a right as Senators upon this floor to have at least a reasonable debate upon every important public question. That is my answer to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that there has been no disposition manifested on the part of the friends of this bill to prevent a fair and full debate. On the contrary, we have from the beginning offered to agree to any length of time that the opponents of the bill might suggest as being reasonable for full and complete debate. The fact that one of the opponents of the bill took the floor when the bill was taken up to-day and occupied the whole afternoon in discussing an irrelevant matter, a matter that had no relation to the bill, is certainly a thing we can not be held responsible for. It seems to me that would be only a proof of what I suggested to-day might be the tactics of those who did not intend to have a vote on the bill, simply because they were opposed to it and they did not propose to allow the majority to say what they see fit.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator one question. There is not any disposition on this side to delay a vote unduly. There is not any doubt as to the result. The Senator and his associates have the power. They can pass this bill that is believed by very many Senators to be fraught with calamity. The Senator can not deny that it is a measure of almost supreme importance. Has he ever known in his service here any measure of commensurate importance to this where within one hour after it was put upon the Senate it began to be insisted that a time for voting should be named? I never have. That is not the process by which the Senate does business. Senators reporting an important measure like this allow the debate to go on, and the debate does go on sometimes for days. Here it can not go on for many days, because there are other questions coming up and the time of the session is short.

The Senator ought not, I think, at once to begin to insist that we shall fix a time. The Senator is safe and his bill is in the hands and the good sense of the Senate if he never got an agreement. On the tariff measure the Senator from Tennessee was constantly asking that the time be fixed. No time was fixed, but when the debate was ended the good sense of Senators in the minority asserted itself, as it always does, and a vote was taken. I have never known under the rules that are so much denounced any measure of public importance that did not in the end get a vote and the majority did not have its way and pass the bill.

There is great feeling in the country about this bill; there is great alarm about it. Whether or not some of us participate in the extent of that alarm I will not say, but there is great alarm about it; and the Senator ought not now at this short time, at this late hour, insist upon this side fixing a time. Let him take his chance, and when the debate is fairly over, as the Senator from Iowa says, he will get a vote.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let me remind the Senator that when the bill was first proposed to be taken up the very first member of the Senate to suggest that on account of the shortness of the time we could not perhaps enter into a discussion of this kind was the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The importance of disposing of the appropriation bills makes it a reason why we shall proceed promptly with whatever we have in hand. This question is not a new one. It has not been sprung within an hour. It has been discussed by everybody in the United States for the last twenty years.

Mr. HALE. This bill is new.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Everybody here has his mind made up, and everybody now knows just how he will vote.

Mr. HALE. My suggestion was made to the Senator in the hope that he would not embarrass the business of the Senate and would withdraw it. But the Senator I think will see that he will gain nothing at this late hour by insisting upon a prolonged session and insisting upon an agreement. He will get a vote quicker if he does not insist upon it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator suggest any hour or any day between now and the 4th of March when we will take a vote?

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that if we should now agree upon a time when the vote should be taken the benches here would be vacant within three minutes? There would be no debate?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Simply because everybody's mind is made up.

Mr. HALE. There would be no attention given, and nobody would be here except at the time when the vote is taken.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That would only show that there is no necessity for debate.

Mr. HALE. Not in the slightest degree. There ought to be a fair debate; there ought to be a questioning; there ought to be views interchanged, and the country ought to see—there is the point—that we do not prematurely agree upon a time. When the time has come, and it will not be very far distant, the Senator will get his vote.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will agree to a vote at any hour tomorrow, and will agree that the whole time shall be occupied by the opponents of the bill between now and then, so far as I am concerned, and I believe that everybody on my side of the question will agree to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall object to making any agreement tonight as to when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to make an apologetic statement with reference to the Senator from Connecticut. I rose some time ago. Seeing two or three Senators upon the floor, I mistook a gentleman who had the floor for the one who was entitled to it and asked his permission to resign the floor. After waiting a while I came in and found a similar condition, not noticing even the Senator from Connecticut in his seat; and I may be pardoned for supposing that he had not the floor when he was not even within the Chamber. That is not what I would like to say, but I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to say a single word in regard to the suggestion last made by the Senator from Arkansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Arkansas says this is not a new question. I submit that the proposition made by the Senator from Arkansas is an entirely new one. In the wide range of imagining of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] he never suggested any scheme like this.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Arkansas is entitled to a patent on the scheme.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state his inquiry.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ascertain who is entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor, and yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I trust I may be permitted to proceed; but before resuming the thread of my argument I wish to say that the remark made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] struck my ears harshly. I do not think that Senator, if he was opposed to a bill and desired to be heard upon it, would relish a question on my part addressed to him or to the Senate as to whether debate was any use, as to whether every member of the Senate had not his mind made up. Mr. President, we might as well abolish all rules for debate if that is to be the way in which debate, and legitimate debate, is to be treated in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will allow me to say that I certainly meant no discourtesy to him. There is no member in this body to whom I would not sooner be guilty of a discourtesy than to him. But I did mean that after the fifteen or twenty years of discussion of every phase of this question there is nothing that he or I or anyone else can say that will change a vote on this floor.

Mr. PLATT. When the dark shadow of this Administration shall have passed away from the Senate Chamber and the light of a new Administration shall have penetrated these walls it may be that the tariff question will come under discussion again. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee will then relish anyone telling him from this side of the Senate Chamber that we all have our minds made up and that nobody's mind is to be changed by debate.

Mr. MANDERSON. The tariff has been debated for a hundred years.

Mr. PLATT. It has been debated for a hundred years, and yet when it comes up it will be a proper subject for debate. It will be proper for Senators to express their opinions upon it, and if they fail to do so they will not be doing their duty to their State or their country.

Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate here this evening. I did hope to have the opportunity of expressing my views upon this bill without interruption in an earlier portion of the day, but I commenced to speak at a very unfortunate time, unfortunate for myself as well as unfortunate for the Senate. Ordinarily when there was no such hot haste and no such coercion attempted of the Senate as is attempted now, as a simple matter of courtesy I would have been permitted to continue my remarks in the morning. But I do not ask for any courtesy. We understand perfectly well that no courtesy is to be extended to Senators who do not believe that this bill is a good bill for the country. We do not propose to retaliate by endeavoring to defeat the bill by discussion or by taking the time of the Senate, but we do wish to have a fair opportunity to express our views in relation to it.

I can not understand the remarkable haste and the remarkable pressure which is evidenced from the other side of the Chamber in relation to the bill, especially in view of the fact that they know it can not become a law at this session of Congress. The trouble about it is just what I said before my remarks were interrupted. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who wants this bill to be passed into a law—not one. It is a playing for position on the part of Senators who bring this bill forward. It is to make a record by apparent sympathy with the further use of silver when they do not believe that this is a proper or profitable use of silver in the country.

Mr. President, if on the other side there was the slightest belief that this could be passed into law and the Senators who brought it forward desired that it should be enacted into law there would be a little more reason for pressure that there should be a vote without debate upon it. I submit that from the time this bill was taken up until I rose to try to express some views in opposition to it there had been no debate whatever upon the bill. It may possibly be thought that I am not debating it, and yet I announced that I would endeavor to confine myself in the remarks which I might make to the bill.

As I said, I am in favor of bimetallism, first international bimetallism, which I believe that we have a fair opportunity to secure now, and which I believe just such bills as this introduced into the Senate of the United States are more calculated to hinder than the efforts of those gentlemen whom the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] delights to call the gold combination. If we can not have international bimetallism, involving the fullest use of silver as money, I am for bimetallism in the sense that I am willing that silver shall be used in this country as money just so far as it is safe to do it without endangering bimetallism. I am not a monometallist.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut what he means by a monometallist.

Mr. PLATT. I decline to be interrupted. I wish to be permitted to finish.

Mr. STEWART. Good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. PLATT. I am not a monometallist. I am not a gold monometallist nor a silver monometallist. The time was when the men who desired the unlimited coinage of silver said they did not wish to drive gold out of the country; that they did not wish to go to a single silver standard. I trust that they have not yet abandoned that position. I trust that the friends of silver, as they are called, the men who wish the largest use of silver, have no desire to put this country on a silver basis. If they do now desire it they have within a few years changed fronts. What they used to tell us in the discussion on this subject was that there was no danger of that.

Mr. President, I am willing to go just as far in the direction of the use of silver as money in this country as it is safe to go, and beyond that I do not think I ought to be asked to go. I do not think the friends of silver ought to desire that I should go further. The trouble, the difficulty, the reason why we do not agree is that we can not agree as to the effect of the unlimited use of silver. I have faith to believe that if the advocates of silver thought that this unlimited coinage would result in putting this country upon a single silver standard they would not desire unlimited silver coinage. If I believed that it would not put this country upon a silver basis, where silver should be the only standard money in use, I would be in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver. There is the difference between us. It is an honest difference. I am willing to go just as far in the use of silver as money as we can go without the immediate danger of putting this country upon a single silver standard and making it a country where silver is the only metal used for money. Now, I am not prepared to say how far we can go, but I am pretty sure we can not go to the extent of this bill. To my mind there is no surer method of reaching silver monometallism than the adoption of this bill.

If the question of silver coinage, limited or unlimited, free or restricted, were a question of coinage merely, there would not be so much danger in it; but the old idea of coinage has all been eradicated from this question. Nobody wishes silver to be coined now and the dollars taken away from the mint by the person who brings silver to the mint for coinage.

It is the new invention of paper money issued upon the silver coined which accounts for all the desire for unlimited silver coinage. I venture to say that no holder of silver bullion would, if this bill passed and he had not the opportunity of turning his silver dollar into certificates, bring one dollar of silver bullion to the Treasury to be coined into silver dollars under it. We have already used silver in this country as money beyond any possibility of the use of the actual silver coin as money. We have 331,000,000 silver dollars, if I am correct in my figures, which circulate by means of paper tokens or representatives. We have about $90,000,000 for which no silver certificates have been issued, say $30,000,000 of which are lying in the Treasury unused, and $60,000,000 of which are in actual circulation among the people.

Now, Mr. President, that amount can not be greatly increased so far as actual circulation of silver is concerned. It may be increased somewhat, but our present use of silver is far beyond what the people would use if they had to use the silver dollar. So that all this contention for free coinage, all this contention for the unlimited coinage of silver, simply means that more paper money is to be issued by the Government.

That leads me to say that I believe the vice of our whole financial situation lies in our paper currency. I know that in saying this I shall not meet with the approval of a good many of my associates, but I regard it as one of the most unfortunate epochs in the history of the United States when under a supposed and a real necessity we departed from the ancient methods and practices and customs of the Government to simply coin the metals, silver and gold, and resorted to a paper currency. No country ever did it, whether the paper was redeemable or irredeemable, that did not suffer for it in the end.

When we resorted to the greenback I venture to say that there were not ten public men in the United States who claimed that it was a sound financial measure. The men who advocated it, the men who insisted upon it, resorted to it upon the plea of necessity only, acknowledging that it was unsound finance, promising that when the war should be over and our great expenses arising from the war should no longer have to be met, greenbacks would be retired from circulation, never for a moment admitting or supposing that they could pass into our financial system; but they have been incorporated in our system.

In addition to that amount of paper money, the greenbacks, we have about $480,000,000 of silver paper, speaking in round numbers. We have in this country, then, about $875,000,000 of paper money. That money is responsible for the growth of paternalism in this country. The people from coming to believe that it was not sound finance, that the only function of Government with regard to money was to coin gold and silver, placing the Government stamp upon the metal and delivering it to the person who should bring it to the mint, and regulating the value of it, have come now to believe that in some way or other it is the function of Government to furnish money to the people, to believe that it is one of the functions of Government to make every man's business as profitable as the man himself shall desire it to be. It is the inherent vice of Government paper money that the people look to the Government to furnish them with money and to regulate the money of the Government so that they can be prosperous in their business.

The sentiment first began to appear, Mr. President, when we had the greenbacks only in circulation. Then there came to be an idea that if there happened to be a little squeeze of the money market in New York the Treasury must relieve it by the manipulation of its paper money. It was the speculators of Wall street who first conceived the idea that it was the duty of the Government, by the regulation and management of its paper money, to make good times in Wall street. Then, as time went on, the silver certificates were issued and another class of people caught up the idea of the Wall street speculators. The banker, the business man who was dissatisfied with his business, who began to feel the pinchings of his exhausted credit, thought that the Government must do something with the money in its Treasury to relieve the times, to restore confidence, to rehabilitate business. The fever spread from the speculator to the banker, from the banker to the business man, and then to the general community engaged in mercantile or business transactions. The moment there came to be a pressure the idea was boldly put forth that the Government was responsible by its money transactions, by its regulation of money in its Treasury, for all the conditions of business—for all distress.

It spread still further, till the farmer on his farm, conceiving the idea that the Government, through its manipulation of its paper money, had been favoring the Wall street speculator, the banker, the merchant, and the whole class of people engaged in other business than that of production, conceived the idea that it was the duty of the Government to help him with its paper money. The farmers wanted it issued on real estate, or they wanted that money should have no security behind it, and the cry went up, "Why should not the Government furnish us with money and help us out in our distress just as much as it helps the speculators in Wall street or the bankers of the East?"

So, Mr. President, the whole country has become demoralized with this idea that the Government may properly and wisely issue paper money, and regulate not alone the value of money, but the value and conduct of all business throughout the country thereby. There never was a more fatal governmental heresy than that national benefit is to be derived from issues of governmental paper. There is not another solvent nation in the world which does it, or which would think of doing it. Perhaps that statement is a little too broad. Canada, I think, has a few millions of paper money which it assumed upon the consolidation of the different provinces into one government. It is possible that in Germany there is a little paper outstanding, which the consolidated German Government assumed when it took in its provinces; but any nation that issues its promise to pay as money has embarked on a road where it is almost impossible to turn about, the end of which is in disaster and financial distress and ruin.

My greatest objection to the use of silver is in the issuing of paper money upon it. There is where the danger lies, Mr. President. We can maintain at a parity with gold coin all the silver coin at a ratio of 16 to 1 which the people will use as coin, but I firmly believe that we can not maintain at a parity with gold all the silver upon which we can issue paper money in this country. Why? I do not stop to discuss the old theory of the intrinsic value of money; but one thing is true, and that is that if there are two kinds of money the bullion value of which differs materially the cheaper kind will drive out the more valuable kind if it becomes sufficiently redundant. That is denied by no one. If we continue the purchase of silver, the bullion of which has only a gold value of 50 cents to the dollar, and continue putting out paper upon it without limitation, we shall finally arrive at that point where the cheaper money will drive out the more valuable money and where gold will go to a premium. I do not say when that point will be reached; but that it will be eventually reached, if this process goes on, I can not doubt.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator insists upon maintaining the Gresham law, how can he reconcile that with his declaration that he is a bimetalist? In other words, how can we establish bimetalism if one of the metals only can be with us at a time?

Mr. PLATT. The Gresham law does not say any such thing, Mr. President.

Mr. PEPPER. I understood the Senator was arguing that the cheaper metal would drive out the dearer metal.

Mr. PLATT. It will if the cheaper metal becomes too redundant. To that every financier agrees. You can use two metals of different bullion value together to a certain extent. If the United States Government should stamp 412½ grains of copper as a dollar, receive it for Government dues, make it a legal tender, and put no more of it in circulation than was fairly required for the payment of Government dues, and to meet perhaps the views of some few people who believe that the stamp of the Government is all that is needed, it could carry copper dollars of 412½ grains to a certain extent just as well as it can silver dollars of 412½ grains when the bullion in the dollar is only worth half as much as the gold dollar. But if you kept that process up, and issued those copper dollars until they were vastly in excess of what was required to be used for the payment of the Government dues, and in excess of the amount used by those who believed that the Government stamp will carry anything as a dollar, when the amount exceeded those requirements, then those dollars would become valuable only as copper. So, if by this system of issuing paper upon silver you get into circulation more silver than is required for the use of payments to be made to the Government, and up to a point where a majority believe that there is too much of it, then the silver which the paper represents will be valuable as silver only.

I may be old fashioned, Mr. President, in these ideas, but they were learned in my youth, and I have not been able, with all the attention which I have given to this subject, to divest myself of them. You can use two metals together where the bullion value differs, but if you use the cheaper metal too long and to too great an extent, then the money coined from the cheaper metal will become valuable only as metal.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator yield to an interruption?

Mr. PLATT. Not now. Let me go on.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator declines to yield to an interruption, of course I shall not interfere with him.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the trouble is that the Government has gone into the banking business, and no financial measure which does not look to the retirement of the Government from the banking business is going to be of anything but temporary avail. When we settle this question, we must settle it upon sound financial principles. That is our trouble now. With $75,000,000 of paper money out, $346,000,000 of which is directly redeemable, if not by law, by our custom, in gold, and $155,000,000 more of what are called the Sherman purchase-act notes which have also been treated as being redeemable in gold, we have in round numbers nearly $500,000,000 of paper money to be redeemed in gold, and in addition to that are the national-bank notes, which may come in for gold redemption. I do not speak of that, however, because I am speaking of the absolute Government paper money. What does that involve, Mr. President? It involves our keeping a fund of gold in the United States Treasury all the while lying idle, until demand may be made upon the Treasury for redemption. It involves our keeping sufficient gold there so that everybody will be satisfied that there can be redemption under all circumstances.

We have by law put it out of our power to get a dollar of gold into the Treasury except by borrowing it. Then comes the necessity of meeting a demand for gold in our foreign payments, and so the gold is gradually or rapidly depleted from the Treasury, when we fill it up, as it were, with a sufficient reserve fund. This thing is to go on forever. So long as our present system of paper money continues there is no relief from it.

This proposed law would simply add to the difficulty. We have demands upon us for gold, and we shall have so long as we trade with any foreign country which uses gold. It is unavoidable.

People think very often when we reckon up what is called the balance of trade, of merchandise trade, and find that we have sold so many goods abroad and we have bought so many goods from abroad, that we have struck the balance of trade, and that if it comes to ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty million dollars in a year that that is all the demand there is upon this country for gold. That is a very great mistake. What is called the balance of trade, meaning merchandise trade, is ordinarily the factor of least importance in the question of the foreign demand for gold. All that our people abroad spend in foreign lands goes abroad as gold; all that we owe as interest upon our Government bonds and the gold securities which are held abroad has to go in gold; all that we pay in freights carried in foreign bottoms has to be paid in gold. The balance of securities which may be sold in this country by foreigners over and above the securities which are purchased in this country by foreigners has to be paid in gold. All these are uncertain quantities, but they continually help to deplete the Government Treasury of gold.

If it were not for this paper money no gold could be taken from the Treasury of the United States. The outgo of gold from the United States Treasury to a foreign country is possible only as a result of this system of paper money, which has been so unfortunately fastened upon the country. Then we have to resort to borrowing. We think that gold redemption must be maintained. The most extreme silver advocates, I think, will agree that it is for the interests of the country that gold redemption should be maintained, that we should not, by a failure to maintain gold redemption, be thrust upon a silver basis. So, Mr. President, the drain goes on; and when there is a large drain of gold to foreign countries, the timid people in our own country begin to be frightened and they begin to draw gold from the Treasury by presenting paper money for redemption.

If we had not departed from the old system of coining gold and silver for the persons who brought it to the mint and in paying our own obligations in coin, or in the checks and bills of exchange which make up so large a proportion of the payments of this country, we should have no trouble. All this idea that the people have a right to depend upon the Government through its money transactions and its issue of paper money to regulate their affairs to their liking, would not be present, and this paternalism, socialism, and populism, latent or rampant, would never have got such a foothold in this country if it had not been encouraged by the false financial system of paper money which we have inaugurated.

I know that in the minds of a great many people I am talking financial heresy. I remember when I first came into the Senate a message was received from the President in favor of the continued retirement of greenbacks, and I saw the remarkable spectacle of the Secretary of the Treasury recommending that there should be no further retirement of greenbacks.

The difficulty with this question is to get rid of our paper money without disturbing the financial condition of the country. That is a serious question. It requires the attention and study of the best, the most careful, and most thoughtful financiers; but that we ought to do it in such a way and as rapidly as possible, without disturbing the financial conditions and dealing a serious blow to business, I have not the least doubt, Mr. President.

This road of Government paper issues, as I remarked awhile ago, can lead only to disaster in the end, and the worst feature about this bill is that it goes on adding, adding, forever adding, to the volume of our paper money.

Something was said within a day or two past in the Senate about paying off the bonds in silver, as if that were practicable. I think, in a rough calculation which I made while on my feet, that I said that 100,000 silver dollars would weigh about 3 tons. I do not think I was far out of the way. A million silver dollars would weigh 30 tons. Now, suppose—and it is not an unusual supposition at all—that a man in some institution has a million dollars in bonds coming due to be paid. Who supposes that they could ever be paid at the Government Treasury or at the sub-treasury by the passing over of 30 tons of silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. Are they ever paid by passing the actual gold over?

Mr. WOLCOTT. What is the weight of the gold?

Mr. PLATT. The weight of the gold is one-sixteenth as much as that of the silver, I think.

Mr. TELLER. No; that is the value. The weight is greater in proportion.

Mr. PLATT. I am not able to state what it is; but whether it be more or less, we have the spectacle now before our eyes of gold coming by every ship from Europe, and a little while ago going by every ship to Europe.

I agree that neither gold nor silver are to be used fully in the payment of debts and of bonds; that the method and practice of paying by bills of exchange, checks, and drafts meets generally the requirements of business.

Mr. President, if I had not been interrupted I should have been able to state the views which I have upon this subject in very much less time. I am willing, I repeat, to go as far as I believe it will be safe to go in the use of silver, and I believe it is safe to continue its use until it is made certain or probable that we are going upon a basis of silver alone, and I believe that we have more trouble to-day and there is more fear of future trouble from our paper money than from any coinage of silver which could possibly be utilized in this country in any other form except by the use of paper money.

How much bullion would this bring to the mint? No one knows. It might bring the entire American product not required for use in the arts; it might even bring the foreign product if there was a surplus not needed for use in foreign countries; but to what extent it would bring bullion to the mint I can not foresee, nor can anyone; but the possibilities are that it may increase our silver paper currency even at the rate of $50,000,000 a year.

We can not afford to trifle with such possibilities. If the bill were enacted into law and the silver certificates issued in pursuance of it which might be issued upon the silver bullion that might be brought to the mints, I have no doubt that in a short time it would drive gold to a premium and put the country upon a purely and exclusively silver basis.

If we are to have a greater use of silver there are a great many better ways in which it can be done than is proposed by the pending bill. I am not wise enough nor is there time enough for me to outline such methods here this evening at this late hour. But of all the foolish, illogical, impracticable methods for the use of silver none has ever surpassed or equaled the measure which is being pressed by the Senator from Arkansas as the deliberate judgment of the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY (at 7 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.). I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I am in hopes that if that is done we will be able to dispose of this question.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to make a report?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island temporarily withdraws the motion, and yields to the Senator from Missouri.

REGULATIONS TO PREVENT COLLISIONS AT SEA.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 2788) to postpone the enforcement of the act of August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea;" was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the President, in accord with the proposition of Great Britain to enforce on March 1, 1895, the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and on the representations of that Government that those regulations had received the general approval of the several foreign maritime powers, pursuant to section 3 of the act of August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea," issued on July 13, 1894, his proclamation fixing March 1, 1895, as the time when the provisions of said act, as amended, embodying said revised international regulations shall take effect; and

Whereas the Government of Great Britain has withdrawn from the position, communicated to this Government on April 25, 1894, that no time should be lost in carrying those regulations into effect, and on January 16, 1895, announced to this Government that the Government of Great Britain now finds it impossible until Parliament has been consulted to fix a date for bringing the regulations into force, and earnestly requests this Government to consent to a temporary postponement of the enforcement of said regulations; and

Whereas it is desirable that the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea shall be put into force simultaneously by the maritime powers: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said act of March 19, 1890, take effect not on March 1, 1895, but at a subsequent time, to be fixed by the President by proclamation issued for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, in this matter Great Britain has pursued her usual entirely selfish course. She has disregarded entirely every nation but herself. A maritime congress assembled in Washington in 1889 at the suggestion of Great Britain. Her delegates appeared, and they were the chief instruments in procuring from that congress the rules of the sea which have become a law by the proclamation of the President of the United States. Very early the British minister called upon the President of the United States and requested him to issue a proclamation and make the regulations a law. He says:

In this form the regulations have received the general approval of the several foreign maritime powers, and Her Majesty's Government consider that no time should now be lost in taking steps to carry them into effect, and they now propose, after careful consideration, to enforce the regulations shown in the inclosed paper on and from the 1st of March, 1895.

Having regard to the paramount importance of securing international agreement with regard to these regulations, I am instructed to express a hope that the same course will be adopted as that determined on by Her Majesty's Government, in order that the rules may become law in both countries on the same day.

The President of the United States issued his proclamation at the request of Great Britain, and the regulations were to become effective on the 1st day of March. Then, after the proclamation had been issued, Great Britain notified the President of the United States that she did not desire those laws to go into force; that she desired further time for consideration. That of course compelled France, who had agreed to the propositions and had published her proclamation, to withdraw, because, as a matter of course, in a law of the sea where both nations occupy to such an enormous extent the British Channel, France could not agree to regulations unless they were also agreed to by Great Britain. Great Britain compelled Belgium to withdraw. The result is that we are compelled to-day, simply on account of Great Britain's utter disregard of everybody in the world but herself, to enact this measure into law to save human life. If no human life were in danger I for one never would consent to any such performance.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to add to the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in which I fully concur, the statement that in the Washington conference of 1889 there were 28 nations represented. Those 28 nations in 1894 owned a total tonnage of more than 24,000,000 tons, while the nations not represented owned only 127,000 tons. When the President issued his proclamation in July, 1894, enforcing the rules on March 1, 1895, the assent of the United States, Great Britain, and France carried with it 16,230,000 tons, or two-thirds of the tonnage of the world. There was a further assurance by Great Britain that the approval of several foreign maritime powers would be procured.

I might add that in April we were informed by Great Britain that it was desired that the rules should be put into effect upon March 1 of the present year. We were never notified to the contrary until a very late date. Yet it appears from correspondence contained in the document referred to by the Senator from Maine that the Government of Belgium had been apprised in 1894 by the British Government that the rules referred to would not go into effect upon March 1, 1895, thus disclosing that although Great Britain had informed us in 1894 that she would acquiesce, and even suggested the adoption of these rules, to go into effect on the 1st of March, 1895, nevertheless she had apprised her representatives in Belgium that they would not go into effect upon that date.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maine that if it were simply a matter of diplomatic controversy I should be opposed to acceding to any such request, or rather to the circumstances created by the English refusal to agree to those rules. But life and property being involved, it passing unchallenged that Great Britain possesses such control of the sea, there is nothing left for us but to pass the bill and place within the proper jurisdiction the power to put the rules in force, which, if the great maritime powers of the world, and especially Great Britain, had acted in good faith, would without controversy be the dominating rule of conduct on the seas upon the 1st of March.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is the consideration of this bill open to objection? I did not understand that there was to be any debate upon it at the time it was taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I would not have consented to its consideration if I had known that it was to be debated. I did not understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the bill will take but a few minutes. Mr. STEWART. If there is going to be any more debate I will object to its further consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had observed from time to time the proceedings by means of which, as a result of international conference, the new rules of the sea have come to be embodied in an international code. It has taken, I think, several years from the time of the first conference.

Mr. WHITE. Since 1889.

Mr. CHANDLER. Since 1889, when the movement originated. I had supposed that the thing was an fait accompli. I had supposed that there was no more possibility of delay. I am very much surprised at the condition of affairs which has led to the proposition to repeal the code which we so lately enacted. I rose, therefore, for the purpose of asking some one of the Senators who are familiar with this subject whether the objections of Great Britain were specific to parts of the code or whether their objections are general to the whole of it. What is the specific trouble? Is it likely to be obviated; and, if so, how soon?

Mr. FRYE. Great Britain says that it is desirable that these rules shall be submitted to the Parliament; that is, they will be submitted and there considered before a great while; and the probabilities are that no longer than six months' delay will be required. But Great Britain will pursue her own course, utterly regardless of us, of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. She specifies no particular objection to the rules?

Mr. WHITE. With the permission of the Senator, I desire to state that on February 14, 1895, Mr. Gibson Bowles, Conservative member of Parliament, made a motion in the House of Commons hostile to the new rules adopted here at the conference, and Professor Bryce, president of the board of trade, said that as most other countries had agreed to these rules it was not desirable to reopen the subject. Nevertheless he was willing that a special committee be appointed to inquire into the objections to the decision of the conference. Mr. Bowles eventually withdrew his motion. The matter is pending now, owing to the dispute in England as to whether she should or should not acquiesce.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. The preamble was agreed to.

C. F. LYNCH.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported the resolution submitted by himself on the 22d ultimo, to pay C. F. Lynch the difference between the amount of compensation received by him as an employee of the Government on the riding page roll of the Senate and the salary of a messenger, intended to be proposed as an amendment to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope that motion will be voted down, and I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President—

Mr. ALDRICH. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I object to any other business being injected into this debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the Senator from Arkansas demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. SHOUP] with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay." I vote "nay."

Resolved, That in view of the fact that this Congress will expire by law on March 4, and that there are important appropriation bills requiring the attention of the Senate, it is the sense of the Senate that consideration of such a law be not entered upon at this session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas, who is compelled to be absent, has been recognized to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which will be read.

The bill H. R. 1126 was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAYERS and others objected.

Mr. McRAE. This is a very meritorious bill and one that ought to be passed. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DONATION OF CANNON TO SOLDIERS' HOME, ROSEBURG, OREG.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 237, authorizing the donation of certain cannon to the Oregon State Soldiers' Home, at Roseburg.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 227) authorizing the Secretaries of War and of the Navy to donate to the Oregon State Soldiers' Home, at Roseburg, Oreg., certain cannon, etc.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to donate and deliver, under such conditions as he may deem necessary in order to insure the proper fulfillment of the purposes of this resolution, to the Oregon State Soldiers' Home, at Roseburg, Oreg., such old and unused cannon, muskets, swords, and other implements of war, of copper, tin, bronze, iron, and steel, as are not now and will not hereafter be required for naval uses, for the purpose of being used for parades, anniversary celebrations, and salutes: Provided, That such articles only be donated, under the authority herein contained, as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy may be spared without detriment to the public interests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was agreed to.

Mr. HERMANN. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "Secretaries of War and" and inserting the word "Secretary," so that it will read: "authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to donate to the Oregon State soldiers' home."

The SPEAKER. Without objection that amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

LIEUT. ROBERT B. TUBBS.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5206) for the relief of Robert B. Tubbs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5206) for the relief of Robert B. Tubbs.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read on yesterday, and objection was made to its consideration. The gentleman who objected now withdraws the objection. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on or about the 23d day of August, A. D. 1863, Robert B. Tubbs, as lieutenant of Company I, of the Eighth Regiment of Michigan Cavalry, was dishonorably dismissed from the service of the United States by General Field Order No. 7 of the Army of Ohio, with a forfeiture of all pay and allowances then due; and

Whereas said order was based on the finding of a court of inquiry at which no opportunity was allowed said Tubbs to either disprove the charges alleged against him or to produce any witnesses in his defense: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said Robert B. Tubbs is hereby relieved from such dishonorable dismissal from the service of the United States, and such dismissal and the finding of judgment of said court-martial and the said General Order No. 7 is hereby declared void so far as it affects the said Robert B. Tubbs; and said Robert B. Tubbs shall be entitled to receive the pay and allowances of his rank due to him at the date of his dismissal, with pay and allowances of his rank for three months after the date of such dismissal from such service. And the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized to pay the said Robert B. Tubbs the amount that shall be found due him from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to know who it was that objected yesterday?

Mr. WEADOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

Mr. KILGORE. Has that objection been withdrawn?

Mr. WEADOCK. The gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand from the reading of that bill that it carries the pay and allowance that this man would be entitled to from the time that he was dismissed by the court-martial up to this time?

Mr. WEADOCK. What he was entitled to at the time of his dismissal. He was not tried by a court-martial. He was dismissed on the finding of a court of inquiry, at which no opportunity was given him to be heard. He was never tried by a court-martial. He never had any hearing.

Mr. KILGORE. Do you expect to pay him all the pay and allowances he would be entitled to?

Mr. WEADOCK. Simply what was due him at the time he was dismissed.

Mr. LOUD. This bill does not say that.

Mr. WEADOCK. We are going to amend it.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that the gentleman agrees that we may strike out all after the word "dismissal," in line 10, which eliminates from the bill the pay and allowance of his rank for three months after the date of his dismissal from the service.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. LOUD. He would be entitled to his pay and allowances regardless of your striking that out.

Mr. WEADOCK. All we ask is what was due to him at the time of his dismissal.

Mr. LOUD. He would be entitled to it up to the time of the discharge of the regiment anyway, unless there is a special provision in the bill.

Mr. WEADOCK. He does not ask that.

Mr. LOUD. You should say that he shall not be entitled to any pay or allowances.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Unless that amendment is included I shall have to object.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will agree to that amendment.

Mr. LOUD. That no pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. That amendment can be considered after the submission of the request. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, I move to strike out all after the word "Tubbs," in line 7.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the language proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out the following language:

"And said Robert B. Tubbs shall be entitled to receive the pay and allowances of his rank due to him at the date of his dismissal, with pay and allowances of his rank for three months after the date of such dismissal from such service. And the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized to pay the said Robert B. Tubbs the amount that shall be found due him from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. SAYERS. Now, instead of that, I move to insert the words:

Provided, That said Tubbs shall not be entitled to receive any pay or allowances by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. LOUD. That is right.

Mr. WEADOCK. That will be accepted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Tubbs," in line 7, and insert the following: "Provided, That said Tubbs shall not be entitled to receive any pay or allowances by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEADOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORFEITURE OF CERTAIN LANDS.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8097) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes,' approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That "An act to amend an act to amend an act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof," approved December 12, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes,' approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same is, amended so as to extend the time within which persons entitled to purchase lands forfeited by said act shall be permitted to purchase the same, in the quantities and upon the terms provided in said section, at any time prior to January 1, 1897: Provided, That actual residence upon the lands by persons claiming the right to purchase the same shall not be required where such lands have been fenced, cultivated, or otherwise improved by such claimants, and such persons shall be permitted to purchase two or more tracts of such lands by legal subdivisions, whether contiguous or not, but exceeding 320 acres in the aggregate: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any adverse claim that may have attached to the lands or any part thereof."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 25, after the word "but" strike out the word "exceeding," and insert the words "not to exceed."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, let us have an explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman may make a short explanation of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the bill here sought to be amended many have already secured patents for their lands upon precisely the same terms this bill seeks to extend to those who were not able, for want of the necessary funds, to pay for their lands within the time those who have received patents did.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will pardon me, we can not hear a word he is saying.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Probably about two-thirds of the settlers under the law as it now stands have secured patents to their lands, but by a recent ruling of the Department it is now held that those who have not completed title can not do so, for the reason that their lands do not lie contiguous, although they have not filed upon an amount in excess of the maximum amount allowed by existing law. But in some instances the lands do not lie contiguous and the claimant does not actually reside upon each tract, and the Department has held that they must do so in order to enable them to complete their title to the land which they claim under the act of September 29, 1890. Probably about two-thirds of those who had these claims have been able to perfect their titles under the law, and this bill gives the other third the opportunity to complete their proof, but they can not under the ruling mentioned do this unless this act is passed.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends the passage of the bill. There are a large number of claims hung up, patents suspended, and contests pending, awaiting action upon this bill, or some legislation of a similar character. If some action is not taken final disposition can not be made of them at this time, and a great hardship will be done, many worthy and deserving settlers, who are seeking in good faith to perfect title to their homes under the construction placed upon the act at the time they made settlement. This bill does not enlarge the rights of any one, but is simply to meet a construction which has been placed upon existing law by a recent ruling of the Department. If the title to these lands is not allowed to be perfected in this way the lands will revert to the Government, and instead of the Government receiving the $1.25 an acre for them, as it will if the settler is permitted to perfect title as this bill contemplates, the land will be open to settlement under the homestead laws, and these lands, which are in many cases highly improved, will be lost to the man making the improvement and $1.25 per acre to the Government.

Mr. HERMANN. And the settlers have improved the lands.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. The settlers have improved the lands and are living upon one tract or in close proximity, but it is held that they can not complete the title because the land is not contiguous, notwithstanding the fact they have done all that has been done by a great many who have heretofore obtained title.

Mr. LACEY. What is the maximum amount?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Three hundred and twenty acres; and this does not remove that restriction or in any way enlarge the provisions of the original act, but seeks to put all upon an even standing.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be too large a question to be considered on a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LACEY. It does not cover very many cases.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. It does not cover many cases, but works a great hardship against those who were so unfortunate as to be unable by reason of poverty to obtain title prior to the ruling which cuts them off from the privileges enjoyed by those who perfected title before the ruling cutting off their less fortunate brethren was made. The Committee on the Public Lands unanimously reported in favor of the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

ABRAHAM O. WAUCOP.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2130) for the relief of Abraham O. Waucop.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to correct the military record of Abraham O. Waucop, late captain Company F, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, by removing the charge of absence without leave and dishonorable dismissal from the service and grant him an honorable discharge as of the date of May 15, 1865: Provided, That no pay, pension, or emoluments shall become due the said Abraham O. Waucop by virtue of this act.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 10, strike out the word "pension" and insert the word "bounty."

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman if that bill has been considered by the Committee of the Whole at the Friday night sessions.

Mr. LAYTON. Under the rule, it can not be considered at the Friday night sessions, as the Chairman has ruled that it does not come within the jurisdiction of the Friday night sessions. That has been ruled on.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I object.

Mr. LAYTON. I hope the gentleman will permit me to make a short statement. It is a very meritorious case.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I have no objection to the gentleman making a short statement.

Mr. LAYTON. The beneficiary of this bill, Captain Waucop, is a reputable gentleman, living in my district, where he has always resided except the four years during which he was in the civil war. He enlisted three different times as a private; first on the 16th of April, 1861, in the Fifteenth Ohio Regiment; and he continued with that command until the 27th day of August in the same year, and received an honorable discharge. In a day or two thereafter he again enlisted in the Benton Cadets, of St. Louis, and served with that organization until January, 1862, and was again honorably discharged with the organization at that time. In the summer of 1862 he again, for the third time, reenlisted in the One hundred and eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, and served with that command continuously—in fact, to the close of the war.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Did he get a bounty every time he enlisted?

Mr. LAYTON. On the 28th of March his regimental commander reported that he had rendered himself unfit for duty and had been absent without leave since March 6, 1865, and recommended his dismissal from the service.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What evidence was there adduced except his own statement?

Mr. LAYTON. Nothing except the statement of his comrades who served with him.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. The only point is this: I think the matter is one which ought to be investigated by the Committee of the Whole at the Friday night session.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman understands that it can not be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the Friday night meetings, because the chairman of the committee at the Friday night sessions has held that it does not come within the jurisdiction of those meetings. The chairman of the committee has continuously ruled that they can not be considered during the Friday night sessions, and that is the reason why it has not been so considered.

Mr. PICKLER. It is not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. This is a case for the removal of a charge of desertion.

Mr. LAYTON. No, sir; he is not charged with desertion. He is only marked as absent from the command. He served nearly four years, and was dishonorably dismissed from the service for being absent without leave for about fourteen days, without trial, and that happened three or four days after he was promoted to a captaincy for gallant services. He participated in many engagements and was wounded at the battle of Resaca, Ga. I assure the gentleman that this is one of the most meritorious cases of this kind ever presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman presents so strong a case that I think he had better let the bill lie over until to-morrow. [Laughter.] This is a case that comes within the law if the facts are as stated.

Mr. LAYTON. I will say to the gentleman that I submitted the question to Colonel Ainsworth himself and he told me that it did not come within the statute, because this man was dismissed by order of the Secretary of War. Colonel Ainsworth said that if he had had a trial by court-martial and had been charged with desertion then the case would come within the statute, but that as he was dismissed by the order of the Secretary of War it did not come within the statute. Application was made to the War Department for relief in the first instance and the application was rejected for that reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ELISHA B. BASSETT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, being Senate bill 1483 to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to revoke, disapprove, and set aside so much of General Orders No. 253, Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, Chattanooga, Tenn., dated October 23, A. D. 1863, by command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, general in command, as confirms so much of Special Field Orders No. 171, Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, Murfreesboro, Tenn., dated June 23, A. D. 1863, Major-General Rosecrans commanding, as dismissed Capt. Elisha B. Bassett, captain of Company B, Nineteenth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, from the service for cowardice exhibited by deserting his command while engaged with the enemy at the affair of Thompsons Station, and to grant and cause to be issued and delivered to the widow of said Elisha B. Bassett a certificate of honorable muster out of the service as of the 23d day of June, A. D. 1863. And the widow and heirs of the said Elisha B. Bassett shall not be entitled by virtue of this act to any pay or allowance subsequent to said 23d day of June, A. D. 1863.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the report, which was made by General Black, of Illinois, be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report will be read.

There was no objection, and the report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1483) to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report:

The said Bassett, now deceased, was in the year 1863 captain of Company B, of the Nineteenth Regiment of Michigan Volunteer Infantry; in the early part of March of that year Captain Bassett was in command of his company during the march of his regiment from Brentwood to Franklin, Tenn.; on the 5th of that month the enemy were encountered near Thompsons Station, Tenn., and during the engagement that followed Captain Bassett turned over the command of his company to the first lieutenant and retired to the rear; the colonel of the regiment thereupon reported Captain Bassett for cowardice and recommended his dishonorable dismissal from the service, which recommendation was carried into effect. The purpose of the bill is to correct the military record of Captain Bassett, and to cleanse his memory from the stain of cowardice.

In support of the bill there was laid before the committee the affidavits of Clark, surgeon, and Bennett, assistant surgeon of the regiment; Adams, regimental adjutant, and afterwards assistant adjutant-general of brigade; Anderson, first lieutenant Company H, and afterwards major and colonel of regiment; Shaffer, first lieutenant Company A, and afterwards colonel and brigadier-general; and Privates Bellinger, Beverly, and Ely, of Captain Bassett's company. The facts sustained by this mass of testimony, based on personal and professional knowledge, are, in substance: That in the fall prior to the engagement near Thompsons Station Captain Bassett was attacked with tuberculosis and so prostrated that he was ordered on leave to recuperate, and went to his home, in charge of his wife, who had been sent for to nurse him.

After an absence of two months he rejoined and took command of his company, though greatly emaciated, and remained in service thereafter against the advice of the regimental surgeon. From this until the following spring he spent a portion of the time in hospital, leaving it only a few days before the march to Franklin and the engagement near Thompsons Station. During the march he was obliged to ride in an ambulance; but on meeting the enemy he took personal command of his company and participated in the engagement until a movement up a hill being ordered at double-quick, he found himself too weak to lead his men, and turned his command over to his first lieutenant. This action coming to the notice of the colonel of the regiment, Captain Bassett was reported for cowardice, with the result already stated.

The colonel who preferred the charge and the captain who suffered disgrace are both dead. Were both alive the committee would be justified in reflections in which it now forbears to indulge, for the affiants agree in testifying to the high moral and soldierly qualities of Captain Bassett, and especially to his conduct in the engagement near Thompsons Station, where he remained in command of his company as long as he was able. The affiants also agree in attributing the colonel's charge of cowardice to personal dislike of Captain Bassett, which this superior officer took no care to conceal. This animus is sworn to by all these affiants as of their personal observation and knowledge; and their character and opportunities compel belief on the part of the committee.

It is therefore considered an act of the merest justice that the cloud of dishonor which shadowed Captain Bassett to his grave should now be lifted from his memory; and the committee heartily approve the bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to know if that was the first engagement that this brave captain ever participated in?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it was.

Mr. LOUD. And he immediately had business to the rear. I know how it was, for I have experienced those feelings myself. [Laughter.] The man himself is dead, I understand from the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. And this is simply to enable his widow to get a pension?

Mr. THOMAS. This is to correct his military record, and the bill expressly provides that there shall be no pay or allowance subsequent to the date of his dismissal.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, they will get a pension in some way; but it is so unpopular to object to these bills, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not object in this case although I believe it is a bad bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION OF MERCHANDISE IN BOND.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 277.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of section 3005 of the Revised Statutes, in so far as the same permits goods, wares, and merchandise to be transported in bond through the United States into the free zone of Mexico, so long as the Mexican free-zone law exists, at any point between the western boundary of the city of Laredo, in the State of Texas, and the Pacific Ocean: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond to be delivered at points in the territory of Mexico beyond the limits of said free zone.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is an important measure, and I reserve the right to object.

The report (by Mr. BYNUM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the House resolution (H. Res. 200) entitled "A joint resolution in reference to the free zone along the northern frontier of Mexico and adjacent to the United States," having had the same under consideration, respectfully report the same back with the recommendation that the accompanying substitute be adopted in its stead.

The design of the resolution was to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond through the United States into the free zone of Mexico. The free zone of Mexico is a narrow strip extending along the northern boundary of Mexico from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Ocean. The Government of Mexico does not allow shipments in bond through its territory into the free zone, hence all shipments into this territory are made through the United States. The sparsely settled country along the line between the United States and Mexico makes smuggling easy, and the officers of the Government have found it impossible to prevent the same. The exemption of that portion of "Zona Libre" between the Gulf of Mexico and Laredo is deemed advisable by reason of the navigability of the river between those points. There is no objection upon the part of the Mexican Government to the passage of this resolution and the action proposed to be taken by this Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, this is reported by the committee as a substitute for House joint resolution 260, and the original resolution should lie on the table.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The original resolution (H. Res. 260) was laid on the table.

CLARA A. GRAVES AND OTHERS.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 238) for the relief of Clara A. Graves, Lewis Smith Lee, Florence Lee, Mary F. Sheldon, and Elizabeth Smith, heirs of Lewis Smith, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States shall pay, out of any money in his hands not otherwise appropriated, to Clara A. Graves, Lewis Smith Lee, Florence F. Lee, Mary S. Sheldon, and Elizabeth Smith, heirs of Lewis Smith, the sum of $2,317.77, being their father's and grandfather's portion of prize money as first lieutenant of the brig Warrior, due and unpaid on or about July 17, 1815.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, this is the prize-money case that was fully explained here the other morning. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] at that time asked that the bill lie over until it could be examined, which has been done. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WARNER. This is a case of prize money that was due to the ancestor of these claimants—the claim never having been assigned, which was deposited with the United States court and for which indemnity was offered—which was withheld by the court, and which formed a part of the sum with which the clerk absconded, the clerk having afterwards repaid a large portion of his liability. The bill was brought up here about two weeks ago. At that time the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, asked that it might lie over until it could be examined, as did several others. The papers have been furnished to all of them, and I understand they have examined them, and they have had notice for the last three days that the bill would be called up. I trust there will be no objection to its consideration.

Mr. BROWN. This was paid out of the prize fund.

Mr. WARNER. This was a part of the prize fund.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2599) granting a pension to Caroline E. Weasells.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The following reports of committees were handed in at the Clerk's desk, referred to their appropriate Calendars, and otherwise disposed of as indicated below:

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY.

Mr. OUTHWAITE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, in the nature of a substitute to House bill 8387, the bill (H. R. 8914) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for the loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1885; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 8387 was laid on the table.

INSANE ASYLUM, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JOSEPH, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8999) approving an act entitled "An act to provide an addition to the insane asylum of New Mexico, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. WASHINGTON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported, in the nature of a substitute for House bill 8109, the bill (H. R. 8916) to aid and encourage the holding of the Tennessee Centennial Exposition at Nashville, Tenn., in the year 1896, and making an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 8109 was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 8277) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendment numbered 5 to the bill (H. R. 8234) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4693) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 684) for the relief of Mrs. Evalyn N. Van Vliet, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PALMER, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. HAWLEY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 252) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On February 18, 1895:

An act (H. R. 5603) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the laws relative to shipping commissioners," approved August 19, 1890, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 7839) to bridge the Newark Bay;

An act (H. R. 5216) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 261) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend a portion of the appropriation made in the river and harbor act of 1894 for St. Joseph Harbor, in the State of Michigan, to complete the connection between St. Joseph Harbor and Benton Harbor.

On February 19, 1895:

An act (H. R. 7020) to readjust the salaries and allowances of the postmasters at Guthrie, Oklahoma City, and Kingfisher, in Oklahoma Territory;

An act (H. R. 8488) to relieve Abraham D. Prince; and

An act (H. R. 8563) to adopt special rules for the navigation of harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States, except the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters as far east as Montreal, supplementary to the act of August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea."

ANTITOXINE.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 8695, which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act antitoxine imported from any foreign country shall be admitted free of all customs duties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BRYAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8695) to admit antitoxine free of duty, beg leave to report:

The evidence in favor of antitoxine as a remedy for the dreaded scourge of the race, diphtheria, which has so long defied the skill of medicine, seems to be preponderating, and the few cases in which the remedy has failed may be properly attributed to impurity in the drug. The demand is great and the facilities for its manufacture thus far are not numerous. In time doubtless we shall make it here as pure and as cheaply as elsewhere. That manufactured abroad is mostly under government supervision and with care that guarantees its purity. It should be allowed admission free of duty for the present at least. It is estimated that the loss to the revenue by placing antitoxine on the free list would not approach $1,000, but if it were much greater than that sum and a single life were saved thereby, and the cost of the remedy reduced to the poor, it would justify the loss.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL. I object.

DON CARLOS BUELL.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Don Carlos Buell, late a major-general of United States Volunteers and a colonel in the Regular Army of the United States, to the position of brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army as of that grade, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out "brigadier general" and insert "colonel;" so as to read, "the position of colonel in the Army of the United States."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GOODNIGHT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER ST. LOUIS RIVER.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8327) to authorize the Wisconsin and New Duluth Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the St. Louis River, between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The bill was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The following amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were read and agreed to:

After the word "Wisconsin," in line 8, insert "at such point as the Secretary of War may determine."

Strike out "10," in line 5, of section 2, and insert "25;" so as to read "spans of not less than 25 feet in length."

After the word "draw," in line 7 of section 2, insert "and also a fixed span with a clear length of not less than 200 feet between piers at the low-water line, to permit the passage of rafts under said bridge; and the clear height of said fixed and draw spans above low water shall be determined by the Secretary of War."

At the end of section 2 insert the following: "and that the approaches to said bridge which cross the marshy flats adjoining the channel and which are overflowed at high water shall be upon open pile work consisting of bents not less than 15 feet between centers measured parallel to the axes of the approaches."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HALL of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENGINEER SERVICE OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHELL, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That in addition to the sum of $300 to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for an assistant engineer and three additional laborers, under resolution of January 24, 1895, the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House for the same purposes, and at the same rates of pay, the further sum of $90.25.

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to know when we are going to stop appropriating for this engineer down below.

Mr. SHELL. On the 4th day of March next. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; which was agreed to.

HARRISON B. HOBART.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will dispose of the business on the Speaker's table.

The bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to Harrison B. Hobart, brevet brigadier general of volunteers, was laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. This bill was passed by the House with an amendment. The Senate has disagreed to the amendment, and asks for a conference. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 6, strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty."

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MARTIN of Indiana, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. PICKLER.

MINERAL LANDS IN MONTANA AND IDAHO.

Mr. McRAE. I desire to submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 3476) to provide for the examination and classification of mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Arkansas asks for the immediate consideration of this report. If he does, I shall have to antagonize it, because I want the House to go on with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McRAE. I have no disposition to have any contest over the consideration of this matter; and therefore I ask leave that the conference report, with the statement of the House conferees, be printed in the RECORD, and that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS] be permitted to call it up as soon as the naval bill is finished.

Mr. TRACEY. If the naval bill should be finished to-day and this report should be called up immediately afterwards we should then know nothing more about it than we do now. On that ground I object to the request. If the intention is not to call up the report until to-morrow—

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. There is no danger of its being called up to-day.

Mr. TRACEY. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. McRAE. The request to print the report in the RECORD would hardly imply that I wanted to call it up to-day.

Mr. CAMINETTI. As one of the committee I dissent from this report; and I ask permission to file my reasons for dissenting.

The SPEAKER. The only way to dissent on a conference report is to do so orally in the House.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Let that be the understanding, then.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, this report and the accompanying statement of the House conferees will be printed in the RECORD, and the matter will go over, subject to be called up by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. McRAE. I have made the request that the gentleman from Oregon be permitted to call this up, because when the time comes to do so I shall perhaps not be here. I wish to say now that I hope the report will be adopted. This is an important matter and ought to be disposed of as speedily as possible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3476) to provide for the examination and classification of certain mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments:

In line 8 of section 2, after the word "and," strike out the words "two of whom at least residents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a resident;" and the Senate agree to the same.

In lines 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 of section 3, after the word "determine," strike out the words "and to enable the Northern Pacific Railway Company to select the indemnity for mineral lands, as provided in its charter, the surveyor-general for said State or States shall compute the area of said unsurveyed tract or tracts so classified as mineral," and the Senate agree to the same.

In line 23 of section 5, after the word "published," strike out the words "in the capital cities of Montana and Idaho" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the capital city of the State in which the lands may be situated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

In lines 43, 44, and 45 of section 5, strike out the words "or by some proper officer of the Interior Department, detailed by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose, who shall receive a compensation not exceeding," and insert in lieu thereof the words "unless the Secretary of the Interior shall detail some proper officer of the Department of the Interior for that purpose. The compensation for such service shall not exceed;" and the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS C. McRAE,
W. R. ELLIS,
Conferees on the part of the House.
JAMES H. BERRY,
T. C. POWER,
FRED T. DUBOIS,

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The Senate amendment or substitute in many respects is identical with the bill as it passed the House. Both provide for the examination, classification, and segregation of the mineral lands within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad grant in four land districts in the States of Montana and Idaho by a board of three commissioners for each district. The Senate amendment requires that the examination and classification shall be fully completed in four years from the date of this act. The House bill fixed no limitation.

The most important change is in section 3, which defines what shall be classified as mineral lands. The House provision on this point is as follows:

"That all lands shall be classified and taken to be mineral lands under this act which prior to the passage of this act have been located or patented as mineral lands, or which have, or probably will have, a market value by reason of the minerals which they contain, or which show such indications of valuable mineral deposits as would induce a miner to spend his time or money upon them with the reasonable expectation of finding mineral in paying quantities, or which from their geological formation, or their situation or proximity or relation to known mineral lands, are or probably will be valuable for the mineral therein; and all of these matters shall be considered by the commissioners in determining the mineral or nonmineral character of such lands and in classifying the same."

The Senate amendment on this point is as follows:

"SEC. 3. That all said lands shall be classified as mineral which, by reason of valuable mineral deposits, are open to exploration, occupation, and purchase under the provisions of the United States mining laws, and the commissioners in making the classification hereinafter provided for shall take into consideration the mineral discovered or developed on or adjacent to such land, and the geological formation of all lands to be examined and classified, or the lands adjacent thereto, and the reasonable probabilities of such land containing valuable mineral deposits because of its said formation, location, or character."

The purpose of the change is to make the definition conform to the established practice of the Department and the decisions of the courts as to what should be classified as mineral lands, and has been approved by the Interior Department. The Senate amendment give the Department full power and authority to direct the work of the commissioners and limits the total amount of compensation to be paid each commissioner annually, including transportation and subsistence expenses, to $2,500. It reduces the compensation of the district attorney or his assistant from $15, as provided in the House bill, to $10, and provides that the Secretary of the Interior may detail some proper officer of this Department for the purpose of representing the United States at hearings before said commissioners, with like compensation.

The provision of the House bill which declares that nothing contained in this act shall be taken or construed as recognizing or confirming any grant of land or the right to any land in the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, or as waiving, or in any wise affecting any right on the part of the United States against the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company to claim a forfeiture of any land grant heretofore made to said company, is contained in the Senate amendment. That provision of the Senate amendment relating to indemnity to said road for mineral land, which is apparently in conflict with the spirit of the said reservation of the right to forfeit the grant, is to be stricken out by the adoption of this report.

THO. C. McRAE,
W. R. ELLIS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees to-day, and that the privilege be accorded to members having reports to file to hand them in at the desk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of antagonizing that motion with a contested-election case, the case of Williams vs. Settle, from North Carolina. I do so with considerable reluctance. If I can have the assurance that the House, after this appropriation bill has been disposed of, will take up that election case and dispose of it, I will not make any objection. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that it be taken up immediately after the close of the consideration of the naval appropriation bill and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The matter is a privileged one, and the gentleman can call it up whenever he desires.

Mr. BROWN. I call it up now; but ask unanimous consent that its consideration be postponed until after the completion of this bill, and that it be then taken up and disposed of.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to state to the gentleman that the general deficiency bill ought to be disposed of immediately.

Mr. BUNN. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this case will not be further antagonized by appropriation bills. It has been postponed for many months, and we are very near the close of the session.

Mr. BROWN. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is objection to taking it up at the close of this bill?

Mr. BUNN. I have no objection to that, and hope the House will agree to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Indiana desires to make a special order, and will submit the request. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the House make a special order to dispose of the contested-election case from North Carolina, to which he has referred, immediately after the conclusion of the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SAYERS. I must object for the present.

Mr. BROWN. Then I insist on the consideration of the case now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the contested-election case from North Carolina; and the Clerk will report the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am constrained to antagonize that motion by raising the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland raises the question of consideration as against this election case, and the question is, Will the House now proceed to consider it?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUNN) there were—ayes 50, noes 81.

So the House refused to consider the election case.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that I will ask the House to take up and consider this case at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday afternoon a point of order was pending, made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], on a provision of the bill which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 4, 5, and 6, "8,250 men and 750 boys. * * * And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist as many additional seamen as in his discretion he may deem necessary, not to exceed 2,000. * * * Provided, That hereafter no officer of the Navy shall be deprived of sea-duty pay while attached to a vessel in commission by reason of assignment to duty as a member of a naval court-martial, court of inquiry, or board, or to other temporary duty, or by reason of being sent to a naval hospital for temporary treatment."

The CHAIRMAN. The first point point of order made by the gentleman from Texas was on the language which has just been reported, beginning with the word "and," in the sixth line, down to and including line eight, ending with the words "two thousand." The point of order was made by him that this changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

The rulings which have been made from time to time on points of order raised on the naval appropriation bill have established a pretty clear line of precedents; and whatever may have been the opinion or feeling of the Chair on the original proposition, yet in pursuance of the practice of the House he feels bound to follow the precedents established by previous presiding officers. So that when a provision is offered to a bill providing for an additional ship to the Navy, notwithstanding the fact that it added to the Navy and increased the expenditure, it has been uniformly held that it was in continuation of existing works or objects already in progress, and was not subject to the point of order.

Now, the point is made that this provision in the bill is obnoxious to Rule XXI, and many instances have been cited in support of that position. For instance, it is claimed that the Committee on Military Affairs, if this provision shall be held in order, might properly bring in an amendment or a provision in their bill increasing the military strength of the United States. And yet it seems to the Chair that a moment's reflection will convince any person that the Military Committee and the Naval Committee do not stand on the same footing in that regard.

For instance, the Appropriations Committee of this House has charge of two bills which carry large amounts of money for the maintenance of the Army and the defenses. The fortifications bill carries, for instance, the appropriation for the coast and harbor defenses, and the sundry civil bill carries also large appropriations for the maintenance of the army posts and other expenses of the Army, and the Military Committee brings in the bill providing for the maintenance of the military force of the United States. Now, it would seem to the Chair that under the rulings which have been made it is entirely competent for the committee to bring in a provision in continuation of any public work or object already in progress; that when it is admitted, as it has been by the practice of the House, that it is competent to bring in a provision authorizing the construction of a new ship, that it carries with it also the right to maintain that ship, or to continue and maintain work already in progress. This seems to the Chair to be very clear, and after giving a great deal of consideration to the question, he is obliged to overrule the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 116, noes 80.

Mr. SAYERS. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. SAYERS and Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland.

Pending the division

Mr. BOUTELLE said: Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw this point.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I know what I am doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is dividing, and debate is not in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There are several other appropriation bills still to be passed, and the example the gentleman is setting is a very undesirable one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Maine will be in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 143, noes 37.

Accordingly, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. There are several other points of order still pending—

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GEISSENHAINER] applauds the decision of the committee. I enter my protest against the ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Texas to insist on his other points of order?

Mr. SAYERS. I insist on them all.

The CHAIRMAN. The next point of order is, beginning with the word "eight," in line 4, and running down to the word "boys," in line 5. Will the gentleman from Texas please state on what he bases his point of order against that provision?

Mr. SAYERS. Inasmuch as the Chair has ruled upon the question involved in this, it is not necessary for me to state anything further, because the committee, on this bill, under the ruling can change from officers to privates and from privates to officers without any restriction.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is a reflection on the Chair.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not reflect on the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider it a reflection. The committee have decided this question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should have said a reflection on the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Nor on the House either.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to insist upon his point of order against the proviso beginning in line 10, down to and including the word "treatment," in line 15.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, of course after the ruling of the Chair, as stated in the first instance, the Chair is bound to overrule the other point of order, because it gives the power to this committee to do just as it pleases upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the Chair has made no such ruling.

Mr. SAYERS. But that is the effect of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. SAYERS. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the point of order?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that the point of order is against the following proviso, beginning in line 10, on page 2:

Provided, That hereafter no officer of the Navy shall be deprived of sea-duty pay while attached to a vessel in commission by reason of assignment to duty as a member of a naval court-martial, court of inquiry, or board, or to other temporary duty, or by reason of being sent to a naval hospital for temporary treatment.

I will say to the House that the practice of the Treasury Department was formerly that officers transferred from assignment to sea duty temporarily received their sea pay; but recently the Department has decided otherwise, and the Secretary of the Treasury recommends this change in the law, so as to allow the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to settle with these officers as heretofore.

I will read what the Secretary of the Navy says:

The accounting officers of the Treasury have recently decided that when naval officers attached to a vessel are assigned to temporary duty as members of examining boards, courts-martial, etc., they shall receive shore pay only. Such assignment to temporary duty, which does not detach them from their vessels, in most cases entails additional expense upon the officers concerned, inasmuch as they continue to pay their shares of the ship's mess bills in addition to their hotel bills on shore. In view of this double expense for subsistence, necessarily imposed upon officers in such cases, it does not seem proper that their sea pay should be checked in addition. It is therefore respectfully recommended that such a provision as was inserted in the naval appropriation bill for the current fiscal year, subsequently stricken out, stipulating that the pay of officers shall not be checked in such cases, be commended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems that this changes the existing law.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will state to the Chair that there is no existing law on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Maryland in his opening statement said that it was necessary to change the law.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I did not say it was necessary to change the law, but that there should be a change made to meet this decision of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Treasury has construed the law. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas after he has recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph on page 2, at the end of line 10, the following: "Provided, That any retired officer of the Navy or Marine Corps may, on his own application, be detailed to service as a teacher or professor in any school or college, but while so serving such officer shall be allowed no additional compensation; and ordnance and ordnance stores may be loaned to the colleges and schools where such officers are employed under the same conditions and regulations as such ordnance and ordnance stores are loaned to colleges and schools at which retired officers of the Army are employed."

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will omit the latter portion of his amendment I will not raise a point of order against it; but if he does not, I will submit a point of order against the whole amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the point?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not object to the detailing of retired officers, but I do object to the Secretary of the Navy having authority to distribute ordnance and ordnance stores all over this country at the will and pleasure of any officer.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to have the letter of the Secretary read?

Mr. SAYERS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing if the Chair thinks the point of order lies. But it does not cost anything, and it simply puts the retired officers of the Navy on the same footing as army officers on the retired list.

Mr. SAYERS. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. SPRINGER. And the next part puts them on the same footing as the Army. Wherever army officers are detailed as instructors to colleges or schools the Army may loan to that college or school such ordnance or ordnance stores as are not needed for the use of the Army—all at the expense of the college taking them, and they furnish bond. This simply puts the retired officer of the Navy in this respect upon the same footing as the officers on the retired list of the Army. The gentleman will permit me to have read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on the subject as a part of my remarks.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 23, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reference of the letter of Charles A. Barnes, esq., dated the 18th instant, relative to the proposed amendment of the existing law relative to the detail of officers of the Army and Navy to duty as instructors at colleges, so as to permit retired officers of the Navy to be detailed for such duty, and requesting to be advised whether this Department can recommend legislation as to retired naval officers similar to that which has been made for retired army officers.

In reply you are informed that the last annual report of the Secretary of the Navy embodied a recommendation that Congress be asked to authorize the detail of officers of the Navy on the retired list to duty at colleges as instructors when application for assignment as such may be made. The paragraph containing this recommendation was as follows:

"The detail of officers of the Navy on the active list and of officers of the Army, either active or retired, to duty as instructors at colleges, under certain conditions, is authorized by existing law. It frequently occurs that, by reason of the exigencies of the service, officers on the active list can not be spared from their regular duties and assigned to colleges when asked for. The Department fully recognizes the advantages resulting from details of this character, and it is recommended that Congress be asked to authorize the detail to this duty of officers of the Navy on the retired list who may make application for such assignment. Authority to detail officers on the retired list of the Army to duty at colleges has been conferred by Congress on the Secretary of War, and it seems that a like provision respecting retired naval officers would be just and proper, and would result beneficially to the educational work of the colleges concerned and to the naval service."

"It is further recommended that Congress be asked to amend the act authorizing the Secretary of War to loan ordnance and ordnance stores to certain colleges and schools, so as to accord to such institutions the same privileges when a retired naval officer is employed as that act confers when retired army officers are assigned to such institutions."

You will see from the foregoing extract that it is the sincere wish of this Department that this apparent discrimination against the retired officers of the Navy be removed and that such officers be placed on the same footing with the retired officers of the Army respecting these college details.

Very respectfully,

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

Hon. W. M. SPRINGER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will understand me, I have no objection to the first part of his amendment. It is the latter part of the amendment I object to. If the gentleman will eliminate that I will withdraw the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. To accommodate the gentleman I will modify my amendment in the manner suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph, on page 2, at the end of line 16, the following: "Provided, That any retired officer of the Navy or Marine Corps may, on his own application, be detailed to service as a teacher or professor in any school or college, but while so serving such officer shall be allowed no additional compensation."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Maryland to make a motion that the committee rise, in order that I may get the agricultural appropriation bill, which has just come over from the Senate, disposed of.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 8665), the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8727) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, and I move to nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate thereto and agree to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HATCH, Mr. FORMAN, and Mr. WAUGH.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea of offering any remarks on the pending bill, but there was a single remark made by my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], in the course of his speech on Saturday, which I can not allow to go unchallenged. He said "Nineteen hundred years have passed since the advent of the Man of Nazareth, and instead of growing nearer and more near to a universal era of peace, all the energies, all the inventive talent, all the genius of the human mind are now devoted to the manufacture and construction and suggestion of implements of war more horrible, more fatal in the power of execution, than any which the world has heretofore seen;" by which I understand the gentleman to mean that no progress has been made since the lowly Nazarene was upon earth in the direction of disarmament or of settling disputes among nations by peaceful methods.

Now, I can not subscribe to that statement. Why, Mr. Chairman, a most wonderful event in the history of the world has just here and now happened. It is only a few days since W. Randal Cremer, a member of the English Parliament, appeared in this capital city of the nation bearing a memorial addressed to the Government and Congress of the United States and signed by no less than 354 members of the British House of Commons, asking this Government to join with the Government of Great Britain in framing a treaty to refer to arbitration disputes which diplomacy fails to adjust.

Mr. Chairman, does this most wonderful messenger and this most wonderful memorial argue nothing against the statement made by the gentleman from New York?

The settlement by arbitration of the Alabama dispute, the Canadian fishery dispute by the treaty of Washington, the arbitration of the Bering Sea dispute, are triumphs of peace instead of war, all fresh in the memory of the living generation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, only Friday evening last I attended a meeting in Convention Hall in this city, which seats 8,000 persons, and in that monstrous hall, festooned from its domes and arches, was exhibited a monster petition, the like of which was never seen on the face of the earth, 5 miles long, and signed by 1,150,000 persons, and further signed by officers of societies representing a grand total of 7,000,000 signatures, from citizens not only of this country and England, but of Burmah, Ceylon, Australia, Denmark, China, India, Mexico, Alaska, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, Spain, Uruguay, Brazil, Japan, Corea, Egypt, Finland, Russia, Turkey, Hawaii, Siam, and other nations and peoples speaking no less than fifty languages and dialects.

What does this monster petition pray for? It prays the legislators, monarchs, and rulers of the earth to suppress the drink and opium traffic. A herald of the cross, a weak woman, Mary Clement Leavitt, went forth with this petition in her trip around the world and has been eleven years in collecting these signatures.

Mr. Chairman, does this great movement, championed in England by Lady Henry Somerset, and in this country by that queen of American women Miss Frances Willard, and known as the white-ribbon movement, which has circled the world in its errand of love, mean nothing?

I say, does this argue nothing in favor of disarmament and the ushering in of that glorious day so long predicted in God's Word, when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and when nation shall not lift up sword against nation nor learn war any more?

The gentleman from New York says we should have such a navy, and that one of the objects of these battle ships is to place ourselves in a position to demand our rights in Bering Sea at the cannon's mouth, if necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in an American Navy and will vote for this bill, but I will never vote to use that Navy except as a last and dire resort; only when arbitration and all peaceable methods of settlement of a great wrong have been exhausted.

The principal business of an American navy at present, and I hope it may continue to be its business in the future is a police duty, and by a show of force to represent this Government and protect its citizens and their rights in foreign countries, and especially in semi-civilized countries, as in the recent outbreak in the Sandwich Islands, and in the waters of Brazil and Chile. We need to continue a man-of-war at the present time at Hawaii, not only to defend American citizens in that country and their rights, but to give moral support to the cause of Republican government and good government in those islands, and such an exigency is likely to arise at any time, and hence patriotism dictates that our country should be equipped with a first-class navy that will command the respect of the world. I confess to some misgivings, however, in regard to these great unwieldy, topheavy, heavy-plated battle-ships. The experience of China and Japan show that the swift armor-plated cruiser is more than a match for the battle-ship. While I take this patriotic position in regard to a navy until such time as the nations of the earth will consent to a disarmament it argues nothing to my mind against peace and arbitration for the settlement of national disputes, instead of bloodshed and war, the horrors of which we as a nation and the living generation know too well.

Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, all the seals that ever swam in Bering Sea or in the waters of Alaska, all the fish that ever swam in the waters of Canada, are not worth one day's fighting between these two great Christian, English-speaking nations. God forbid that it should ever come to that.

No, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York is wrong. I am one of those who believe that the world is growing better. There never were upon the face of the earth so many good men and women as now. Never was the disposition so strong to settle national disputes by arbitration as now.

Never were the conditions of war, even among semicivilized countries like the present war between China and Japan, mitigated by so much mercy and humane methods as now, notwithstanding the blot on the record of Japan at Port Arthur. On the field of battle in far off China is seen the flag of the Red Cross Society, the herald of the Prince of Peace.

In Nebuchadnezzar's dream he saw a stone cut out of the mountains without hands that smote the image, which Daniel interpreted by saying, "In the days of the years of these kings shall the God of Heaven set up a kingdom that shall break in pieces and consume all other kingdoms and stand forever." That kingdom has been set up; it is the Kingdom of Prince Immanuel; its banner is the cross; its rallying cry is, "Peace on earth and good will toward men." And its final triumph and success comes on apace and draws near. [Applause.]

On the morning of a memorable battle Napoleon Bonaparte pointed his gleaming sword toward the morning sun, and said to the officers that stood about him, "Behold, behold, the sun of victory!"

Mr. Chairman, methinks I behold the sun of victory, methinks that I behold the dawn of a better understanding among the family of nations, the dawn of peace and arbitration, in place of bloodshed and cruel war.

And I firmly believe that we have seen the last appeal to arbitration by the sword among English speaking people.

The following is the letter and accompanying petition from the members of the British House of Commons to which I have referred, and is altogether the most wonderful memorial that ever crossed the ocean:

[From W. Randal Cremer, M. P., St. Paul's Chambers, 23 Bedford street, Strand, London, W. C.]

LONDON, January 1, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to forward you a copy of a memorial signed by 354 members of the British House of Commons. As the object of the memorial is of the highest importance, and the signatures represent all shades of political opinion in the British Parliament, I venture to ask for the prayer of the memorialists your earnest consideration.

Respectfully yours,

W. RANDAL CREMER.

Hon. E. A. MORSE, M. C.

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

In response to the resolution adopted by Congress on April 4, 1890, the British House of Commons, supported in its decision by Mr. Gladstone on June 16, 1893, unanimously affirmed its willingness to cooperate with the Government of the United States in settling disputes between the two countries by means of arbitration. The undersigned members of the British Parliament, while cordially thanking Congress for having, by its resolution, given such an impetus to the movement and called forth such a response from our Government, earnestly hope that Congress will follow up its resolution, and crown its desire by inviting our Government to join in framing a treaty which shall bind the two nations to refer to arbitration disputes which diplomacy fails to adjust. Should such a proposal be made, our heartiest efforts would be used in its support, and we shall rejoice that the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have resolved to set such a splendid example to the other nations of the world.

I take the liberty to append here also a copy of my reply to the bearer of this wonderful memorial, which was sent to every Senator and Member of Congress:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES.

Washington, D. C., January 13, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 1st instant, inclosing a copy of a memorial signed by 354 members of the British House of Commons, in favor of the framing of a treaty which shall leave to arbitration matters between the Government of the United States and your Government which can not be settled by diplomacy. I beg to assure you that this movement has my most hearty sympathy, and will receive my cordial and earnest support whenever it shall reach consideration in the Congress of the United States. The importance of such a measure to the welfare of the present generation in both countries and to peoples and generations yet unborn can not be overestimated, and is a step in the direction of ushering in that glorious day, so long predicted in God's Word, "when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, nor learn war any more."

Assuring you of my consideration, I have the honor to be,

Your most obedient servant,

ELIJAH A. MORSE.

Member of Congress, Twelfth District, Massachusetts.

To Hon. W. RANDAL CREMER, M. P.,

Riggs House, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the word "law," in line 6, page 2, down to and including the word "thousand," in line 8. The words that I propose to strike out are these: "And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist as many additional seamen as in his discretion may be deemed necessary, not to exceed 2,000." I desire every member of the committee to understand that the provision which I have moved to strike out increases the naval force by 2,000 men, and that an expenditure of nearly $700,000 will be entailed to support this increase if it should become law.

There are 2,000 marines, one-half of whom are rarely doing anything, and my purpose is, if the amendment which I have offered be sustained, to offer another amendment, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to assign to the secondary batteries such officers and men of the Marine Corps as in his discretion may be deemed necessary. That will furnish a force sufficient for all of the ships that have been authorized. The Secretary of the Navy says that he wants only 1,000 additional men for the ships that have been authorized, and that the remaining thousand of the 2,000 here provided for are intended for the battle ships and the other vessels that are carried in this bill. I desire the members of the committee to understand that when they vote against this amendment they vote to increase the naval force by 2,000 enlisted men.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow one question?

Mr. SAYERS. No. Mr. Chairman, the question before this committee is whether, in the closing hours of this Congress, it will vote an increase in the number of enlisted men in the Navy. Why did not the committee bring forward this proposition before the last election?

Mr. MCALEER. It was bad enough as it was. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. And you now wish to make it worse.

Mr. MCALEER. You can not make it any worse.

Mr. SAYERS. It is nearly two years until the next election, and gentlemen may think that the people will forget the action of this Congress in increasing the naval force in a time of profound peace; a time, too, when there is so much distress throughout the country.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many men does the Secretary of the Navy estimate are necessary to man the new vessels that are coming into service this year and next year?

Mr. SAYERS. I understand from the Secretary of the Navy that for the ships that are authorized to be built he needs only 1,000 men, but he wants an additional thousand for the battle ships that are proposed to be constructed under this bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. When are those men required?

Mr. SAYERS. When the ships shall be built; but at any time after this bill becomes law he is authorized to enlist them, and there is nothing to restrain his action.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY. I would like to know what the gentleman from Texas expects to gain by cutting down the efficiency of the Navy in these times.

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer that question if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. RAY. You will occupy my time in answering it.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. I will answer it very briefly.

Mr. RAY. Well, I prefer to occupy my own five minutes, and the gentleman can answer later.

Mr. Chairman, the condition of things all over the world is such that the United States is called upon to maintain its dignity and its character as one of the powers of the earth. We ought to have a war ship in every American port and in every foreign harbor of importance. Whenever trouble arises in any foreign port where we trade, or where American citizens go, we need to be in a condition to send thither a vessel of war carrying the American flag and with force sufficient to maintain the character and dignity of this nation and protect the rights of the Republic and all its citizens. We do not invite war by preparing for it; but we do invite insult and war if we assume a cowardly attitude and refuse to provide a suitable naval armament, so as to let the world see our power.

We are building war ships; why should we not supply them with men? The gentleman from Texas knows perfectly well that we have not a sufficient number of enlisted men now to man the vessels already constructed. There is no sense in his appealing to the Democratic heart and asking his fellow Democrats here why they did not do this or that before election. The Republican party has always been ready to appropriate money to maintain the Navy of the United States; and after being out of power in this House for two years or a little longer, the people of the United States, with full knowledge of the record we had made upon all these questions, with full knowledge that the Republican party is in favor of enlarging the Navy and making liberal appropriations for its support, have seen fit to return us to power here. And I dare say now, and I do say, that if our Democratic friends in making appropriations for this Government had been a little more patriotic, had been a little more liberal, there would be more Democrats in the Fifty-fourth Congress than the gentleman from Texas will see here when we assemble in December next. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. My friend from New York [Mr. RAY] ought not to forget that with all the boasted liberality and patriotism of the Republican party, that party, after having complete control in the Fifty-first Congress, was swept away in the Fifty-second.

Mr. Chairman, this is no political question—

Mr. RAY. You have made it political.

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; not at all.

I do not desire to cripple the Navy; but the Secretary of the Navy has written a letter in which he says that 1,000 men are sufficient to man all the vessels that have been authorized to be constructed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In his annual report he expressly asks for 2,000 men.

Mr. SAYERS. It may be so; but nevertheless he says that he will need only 1,000 men to man the ships which have been authorized to be constructed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This clause simply gives him a discretion.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, discretion! Secretaries have too much discretion already.

Now, what I propose, Mr. Chairman, is this—and there are many officers of the Navy who agree with me—that we utilize a portion of the marine force by assigning that force, or so much of it as may be necessary, to manning the secondary batteries on the vessels in commission.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. It is remarkable that no member of the Committee on Naval Affairs has ever heard of that proposition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas what he means by the statement that naval officers have suggested that we could get along with fewer men if marines were assigned to the secondary batteries.

Mr. SAYERS. Some have been to see me about it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does not the gentleman know perfectly well that there is not a man-of-war in commission to-day on which the marines are not assigned to the secondary batteries?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is no man on a man-of-war who is not assigned to the guns.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, if 1,000 marines be put in charge of the secondary batteries under competent officers, there will be no necessity for increasing the naval force.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SAYERS. That may or may not be so. But I make the statement; and I generally try to inform myself before making a statement.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Before this debate goes further, I want to know how many times a member may speak to one amendment under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Once.

Mr. MONEY. The Chair has twice recognized the gentleman from Texas, while only one member has spoken on the other side. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Texas is going to have simply the same time that is allowed to any other member, or whether he is going to occupy all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has answered the gentleman's "parliamentary inquiry."

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas—I am sorry to say it—does not treat this committee right. He is unfair. I have in my hand a communication on this subject from the Secretary of the Navy. But before reading it I will call the attention of the committee to the annual report of the Secretary, in which he asks for these 2,000 men.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. It would take too much time just now. It can be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

I again renew my recommendation of last year that the enlisted force be increased by 2,000 men. A careful study of the services of the Navy for several years past convinces me that the number of vessels which must be kept in commission and ready for service is greater than the present enlisted force allowed the Navy will suffice to man. Calculations place this increase at not less than 2,000 men, and the law to authorize such increase should be so worded as to permit the Department to enlist them whenever needed.

An efficient and economical service can not be carried on without a fair margin between the number of men absolutely necessary to man the ships in commission and the limit as fixed by law. New ships getting ready for service and constantly recurring emergencies necessitating the dispatch of vessels to foreign waters are causing demands upon the enlisted force which the Department will very shortly be unable to meet. The expense of maintaining the additional number of men asked for will be small in comparison with the results to be obtained and the value of public property of which they become the care takers and defenders.

Our new ships, too, will be of little value without officers and men trained in exercising them. This should not, however, be for a moment understood to mean that the vessels now building and those the Department is asking for in this report ought all of them to be kept constantly in commission. Battle ships and coast-defense vessels, as well as other ships, should be kept as nearly as may be always ready for service. Armored ships, however, and some of the larger cruisers, like the Minneapolis and the Columbia, it would be desirable to keep cruising in our own waters for not less than one year out of three. When not cruising they might be laid up in fresh water under care takers who would maintain them in condition.

Experience is demonstrating that long cruises by our largest vessels are expensive, and there is no question but that smaller vessels better subserve all the purposes of cruising in foreign waters for the protection of American interests in time of peace. Economy is not to be lost sight of by those who would befriend the Navy. Its affairs should be so administered as to entitle it to the continuing support of a people whose patriotism may always be relied upon to respond to every reasonable demand.

If the naval policy I have here ventured to indicate and briefly outline be carried out, there will be no necessity, unless in case of war, to increase the force of enlisted men beyond that now requested for many years to come. This will make the total number of men authorized 11,000.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which any other member could have had if he had asked for the information:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 8, 1896.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 6th instant, I have the honor to inform you that the accompanying list gives the vessels that will be completed and should be placed in commission before June 30, 1896.

Names of vessels.	Probable date of completion.	No. of men required for each vessel.
Amphitrite	Mar., 1895	149
Maine	July, 1895	310
Puritan	do	180
Terror	do	149
Katahdin	do	89
Ericsson	do	24
Texas	Aug., 1895	325
Monadnock	do	149
Boston	Sept., 1895	229
Indiana	do	394
Massachusetts	Nov., 1895	394
Oregon	Dec., 1895	394
Gunboat No. 7	Apr., 1896	130
Gunboat No. 8	do	130
Gunboat No. 9	do	130
Total number required to man vessels		3,177
Total number probably available June 30, 1896		374
Number required		2,803

It thus appears that the number of men that the Secretary of the Navy estimates may be required is greater than the number we have authorized in this bill.

The present strength of our squadrons is not sufficient to meet the constant demands for vessels to protect the interests of our citizens.

It will be seen that if all these ships should be kept continuously in commission, together with those now in service, the number of men provided for in the appropriation bill would not be sufficient, but it is not the intention or expectation of the Department that all the ships belonging to the Navy are to be, in times of peace, in commission. The coast-defense ships are not intended to cruise abroad at any time, nor will the battle ships make distant cruises. In times of peace these two classes of ships are to be kept in commission only a portion of each year. All, however, require to be kept in order and ready for any demand that may be made upon them, and it is essential that as they are completed and delivered to the Navy, they shall each be commissioned and do sufficient cruising to thoroughly test the condition and efficiency of their machinery, battery, and fittings.

It is believed that if the bill passes as it has been reported, authorizing the enlistment of 2,000 men as they may be needed, it need only appropriate for 1,000 men. A proper selection of the ships to be kept in commission, and a judicious distribution of crews among them, will, it is thought, enable the Department to render these 1,000 men sufficient for the present needs.

It is also believed that the increase of 2,000 men now proposed will, properly administered, be sufficient for the wants of the Navy in time of peace, even after the ships provided for in the present bill shall have been constructed.

The vessels now in commission have the minimum number of men on board for efficient handling. Reports from some of the vessels state that more men are needed.

Respectfully,

HON. J. FREDERICK C. TALBOTT,

Chairman of Subcommittee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

It is also believed that the increase of 2,000 men now proposed will, properly administered, be sufficient for the wants of the Navy in time of peace, even after the ships provided for in the present bill shall have been constructed.

The vessels now in commission have the minimum number of men on board for efficient handling. Reports from some of the vessels state that more men are needed.

The Secretary has asked for authority to enlist 2,000 additional men, but the Committee on Naval Affairs concluded that very probably, as we are at peace, he could get along with 1,000; hence, although we have authorized him in his discretion to enlist 2,000, we have appropriated for only 1,000, the amount of the appropriation being $349,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not worth while for the American people to adopt a policy of progressing with the construction of a Navy if they do not intend at the same time to provide means for manning it or authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to enlist men as the necessities of the case require. That is all that is proposed here, and I think that is a sufficient answer to the argument of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SAYERS) there were—ayes 21, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAYERS. I offer a further amendment to this paragraph. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "law," in line 6, down to and including the word "thousands," in line 8, page 2, and insert:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to assign as many officers and enlisted men in the Marine Corps to man the secondary batteries of ships in commission as he may deem necessary."

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who seems to have given a great deal of temporary thought to the organization of the Navy, has stated to the committee this morning that he has received communications from some officers in the Navy who have informed him that some special disposition of the Marine Corps would enable the Secretary of the Navy to man the ships without the necessity of the enlistment of any additional men. I do not know, of course, who these anonymous correspondents of the gentleman from Texas are. I do not know, however, any officer in the American Navy who I think would be willing to have his name used as a sponsor for that sort of a proposition.

The suggestion of the gentleman, or rather his positive statement, that if men of the Marine Corps, who, it is suggested, are now unused in the service, should be assigned to the duty of manning the secondary batteries on the ships of war they would take the place of the proposed enlisted men, is so amazing a statement, that I am compelled to express surprise that a gentleman of the standing of my friend from Texas would be willing to make it upon the floor of the House of Representatives to become its sponsor. Nothing is better known to those who are familiar with this subject than the fact that all persons on board of a naval vessel in time of war, or in the military exercises of the service, are assigned to some station and duty.

There is not a marine afloat to-day who has not his regular station assigned to him in time of battle or in time of the general exercises on board a man-of-war. That condition runs back to the earliest period in the history of the Navy.

Now, if this were a proposition to enlist some more marines, and thereby avoid the enlistment of more seamen, I could understand it, although I can see no reason for it. But the House knows and the country knows that the Secretary of the Navy, who is the authorized and official exponent of that branch of the service, and who, I desire to say to the gentleman from Texas, has at all times the advantage of the advice, counsel, and suggestion of all the officers of the Navy and who, it is to be presumed, has consulted with the officers of the Navy before he made his recommendations to Congress, has stated in his annual report year after year the obvious fact that we must have more seamen to man the ships we are building and putting into service.

In addition to that, I think, my friend from Texas was not quite ingenuous when he undertook to lay such stress on the outside limit of 2,000 additional men fixed in the bill. We have fixed the limit there it is true, but it by no means carries with it the necessity of enlisting that number. On the contrary, he must know, as members who have read the bill must know, that in this matter we have only provided for the enlistment of a portion of the 2,000, and have made provision for the pay and subsistence of but a portion of the 2,000, about 1,000 in all, during the next fiscal year. But we have increased the limit of enlistment 2,000 beyond the present number, because it is obvious that in the near future we will require more men. But there is no more necessity of enlisting the full number now than there was four or five or six years ago, when the maximum was at the present figure.

It was not done then, for the necessity had not arrived. But we have been warned by the obstructive tactics that have been employed whenever the point of increasing the number of seamen was brought before the House that it is desirable in fixing a new limit to place it not at a point to be reached in the next six months and which may have to be changed next year, but to make a reasonable provision for the future, in consideration of the number of vessels provided for and to be put in commission as the public service may require.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to have a minute or two longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We are simply thrashing over now the straw which we have been pounding in the House ever since yesterday afternoon. This is the identical proposition my friend from Texas sought to eliminate by raising a point of order that has been overruled not only by the Chair, but by the approving judgment of the Committee of the Whole on that ruling. We have also had admissions from every member who has spoken, except the gentleman from Texas, that there is need of the additional men. This Committee of the Whole has emphatically voted that it believes in responding to the call of the Secretary of the Navy for these additional seamen.

And I desire to say, in view of the political situation which has been adverted to here, that I think, when the Republican side of this House, standing here on the very threshold of their new responsibility that is to come to us within a few weeks—when we are willing to stand, as we have always stood, for liberal provisions for all of those agencies of government which tend to uplift and maintain the dignity and power of our country, when we are willing to assume responsibility for the future, I think it is remarkable that gentlemen from whose shoulders responsibility is now dropping should resort to the extraordinary obstructive filibustering tactics that we have met here to-day to prevent the response which this House is trying to make to the official appeal of that executive officer of the Government who is charged with recommendations as to the needs of the Navy of the United States.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of my distinguished friend from Texas is of no utility, because of the fact that the marines are already used to man the secondary battery. There is full authority to do that, and they are manning the secondary battery, and as a matter of fact it is inconceivable to my mind that an officer in command of a ship of the United States, responsible for the dignity of the flag, the honor of the nation, the safety of every life on board, and the property of the United States, should do otherwise than make the most proper and efficient distribution of the fighting force under his command. And you will always find that that commanding officer, responsible for the result of the engagement, will put the marines just where they ought to be, and that is in charge of the secondary battery.

Now, as regards the number of the enlisted men, there is a provision here exactly in accordance with the demands of the Secretary for authority to enlist 2,000 men, but provision is made only to pay 1,000, because we believe and the Secretary believes that that is enough for this fiscal year.

Mr. BLACK. What is the necessity for providing for the enlistment of these men if you do not make any appropriation to pay them?

Mr. MONEY. The necessity is just this: Now, in a time of profound peace many of our vessels will be lying in commission and not at service, but the gentleman does not know, nor does any other man know, that in the next nine months we may not have a war. There may be a necessity, as there was in the Brazilian affair, to man and hastily send every available vessel to Rio or some other port.

Mr. BLACK. Why do you not make an appropriation, then, to meet that possible emergency?

Mr. MONEY. The men will be enlisted, and the appropriation will come afterwards if there is a necessity for it. This recommendation has been made by a Secretary who in a long and honorable career in this House distinguished himself for economy in the management of bills in this committee. He is supported by one of the most brilliant young men ever in this House, his accomplished Assistant Secretary, who in his career here also made a great reputation for economy. These two men know what they are doing. They have both served on the Naval Committee. They know what the necessities of the service are, and they would not have recommended it if it had not been necessary.

The committee have gone into the subject and have made an examination that it is impossible for my distinguished friend [Mr. SAYERS] to make, because other and very serious duties have been devolved upon him by the order of the House, and he can not know as well as we do and as well as the Secretary and Assistant Secretary know what the demands of the service are.

As to the special amendment, it is wholly unnecessary. The Secretary and the officers in charge of the ship will place these men where they belong. I myself believe they ought to man the secondary battery. The Marine Corps has been distinguished not only for its drill but for its exceedingly fine marksmanship, which has taken the prize at every competitive firing in the world, and therefore no man need be uneasy that the marines will not be put where they will do the most good.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas, after which he will recognize some gentleman in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have not unadvisedly offered this amendment. I too have served on the Committee on Naval Affairs, both with the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and while I accord to them entire honesty of purpose, yet I do not accord to them complete exemption from all the influences that surround official life.

I know those gentlemen; I know them to be honorable men. There is a struggle going on in the Navy leading toward the taking away of the marines from vessels when they are in commission. I know the effort has been made and will continue to be made. I will say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that officers who were in the Navy long before he entered the naval service have spoken to me upon this subject and have said that instead of taking the marines from aboard these ships when in commission, they ought to be assigned to the secondary batteries, thereby saving the necessity of enlisting 1,000 additional seamen. Gentlemen may do as they please; they may close their eyes to the true condition of this service, and they may vote this increase of enlisted men. Believing it is for the good of the service and that the public expenses may be curtailed, I have offered this amendment and shall insist upon a vote being taken.

[Mr. COVERT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Just one word, Mr. Chairman. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the report of the commandant of the Marine Corps.

On October 1, 1894, there were 2,097 enlisted men in the corps, only 3 short of the authorized number. Of these, 1,196 were on duty at the different shore stations and 901 on board ships in commission.

Now, he says, in addition:

The demand increases every day, both on shore and afloat, particularly in view of the many new vessels which will soon be placed in commission, and I again earnestly request that the Department will take the necessary action to have the appropriations increased for more men, in accordance with my many previous recommendations.

The Secretary of the Navy did not recommend an increase; but the committee will understand that there are 901 of the Marine Corps now serving on ships in commission.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at end of line 15, page 2:

"Provided also, That hereafter the pay of all officers of the line, Medical Corps, Pay Corps, Engineer Corps, and chaplains shall be that now provided by the law for officers of the line of equal rank."

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it changes existing law. Furthermore, there is a bill pending which deals with that subject.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. Under a joint resolution passed by the present Congress and approved on January 12, 1894, subcommittees of three members of the Naval Committee of the Senate and a similar number from the Naval Committee of the House were appointed "to fully investigate and consider the entire subject of the rank, pay, and all other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy, and to report what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises." These subcommittees have attended to the duties assigned them, and their report, unanimously approved by the Naval Committees of the Senate and House, is now before us. Their report covers numerous matters, but there is no one which they have considered more fully and upon which they speak with more emphasis than that relating to the pay of the Navy. This subject of the pay of the Navy has been regulated for twenty-five years by a law which was passed as a rider on the naval appropriation bill of 1870. The committee say that they have patiently studied this law and find unanimously—

1. That it is inequitable in many of its features.
2. That the system of paying officers of the staff more than their immediate commanding officer is subversive of discipline.
3. That the Commission is unable to find among the navies of civilized nations any similar departure from true military principles.
4. They propose an amendment of the existing law in the exact language of that which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, and which they say will remedy the evil.
5. That this amendment if adopted will save the Government $195,000 annually.

This statement, embracing unanimous findings of facts by a committee of this House having full jurisdiction of the subject, it seems to me should be sufficient not only to enable the Chairman to hold that the proposed amendment is in order, but to induce every member of the House to give it his unhesitating support.

The instances of inequality and injustice prevailing in the payment of salaries between the line of the Navy, which constitutes its fighting force, and the staff, which is the ornamental feature of the service, are too numerous to be given in the limited time allowed to me.

There is only one out of all the navy-yards of the United States where the commanding officer, who has all the responsibility, gets as much pay as numbers of the subordinates under him. In all the rest of these great naval institutions the paymaster, whose duties are only clerical, gets more pay than the officer in charge.

Perhaps there is no more striking illustration than in the case of the navy-yard at Washington, where the inspector of ordnance, who superintends and directs the construction of all our immense guns, receives a thousand dollars a year less than the paymaster, whose sole duties are to disburse the stipend to the workmen periodically. The same occurs with the commandant, who also receives less than the paymaster and storekeeper.

There is no greater responsibility placed upon any officer of this Government than upon the commandants of the great cruisers and battle ships of which we are so proud and upon which we are spending so many millions of dollars. These commandants have in their hands not only the great ships which they command and their enormous equipments and the lives of the thousands of men in their forces, but they are representatives of this Government in all the foreign ports of the world—at Honolulu and Wei Hai Wei and wherever our interests are imperiled—and upon them devolve still vaster responsibilities in the protection and defense of the country in the event of war. Is it not a striking commentary on our legislation on this subject that these high officers intrusted with such momentous interests are each paid less than two or three subordinates under their command?

Why should the physicians and paymasters and preachers get more pay than the commanders, upon whose skill and learning and prudence the destinies of the nation depend? No naval system in the world tolerates such an injustice. No steamship company among all the hundreds of great lines whose mighty fleets traverse the seas, carrying millions of passengers and hundreds of millions of dollars of freight, pays its force except on the broad, equitable principle which provides compensation in accordance with the value of the service. Why should not all commissioned officers on the active list of the Navy of equal rank receive the same pay?

This amendment must commend itself to the considerate judgment and approval of every intelligent and fair-minded person, and I sincerely trust it will be held to be in order, and that it may be submitted to the decision of the House.

The section of the bill now under consideration is for the "pay of the Navy." This amendment provides for the equalization of that pay and the correction of manifest wrongs which have long prevailed in the system under which the Government's money has been disbursed. The amendment is therefore clearly germane to the bill.

The law of 1870 provides for the payment of larger compensation to the staff of the Navy than it does to the line. The amendment provides clearly for the reduction of this excess of pay for the staff to the same amounts that are paid to the line. This amount of reduction the Committee on Naval Affairs have found will be at least $195,000, and I have information that the amount will be more than $250,000. The amendment, therefore, with any degree of liberality in the construction of the rules, can be fairly held to reduce expenditures.

This amendment if adopted will promote economy, restore equality and fairness in the payment of our naval force, remove the most potent causes which tend to destroy discipline, and bring our system into accord and harmony with all the naval establishments of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that that is a matter of fact which has no relation to the parliamentary status.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Then I will confine myself now to merely saying that I understand the rule of the House to be that an amendment is in order although it does change existing law, if at the same time it clearly and unquestionably reduces expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. On its face.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. This amendment, I beg the Chair to notice, has been reported by the Naval Committee, and in their report, which is before the House, they declare that it will reduce the expenditures of the Government $195,000 a year. The law fixes the pay of the staff of the Navy higher than the pay of the line, and therefore an amendment which proposes to reduce the pay of the staff must on its face reduce public expenditures.

Mr. HALL of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not rise to speak on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only question before the committee.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I want to speak on the amendment itself when it is in order to do so.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if the amendment is held to be in order I shall desire to be heard further on the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet ruled on the point of order. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] desire to be heard on the question of order?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I do not propose to argue it, Mr. Chairman. I make the point that the amendment changes existing law, and also that there is a bill pending which deals with this subject.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. If the Chair will pardon one more observation, although there is a bill pending which deals with this subject, and although at one time, under the rules, that would have rendered this amendment not in order, that is no longer the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clear on this point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania himself admits that this amendment changes existing law and on its face it does not reduce expenditures. Therefore it is clearly obnoxious to every provision of Rule XXI, and the Chair sustains the point of order. Mr. HERMANN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 10, page 2, add:

"Any officer while within the regular retiring age of 62 years, who has been transferred from the active list to the retired list for disability possibly curable shall be subject to examination, at Navy Department discretion, as to ability to resume the duties of his existing commission; and if found thus able, and there be no further necessity for his continuance as a supernumerary officer, he shall be ordered back to the active list, according to his existing commission, when the next vacancy occurs in that grade."

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HERMANN. What is the point?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. That it would restore a number of officers to the active list and thereby increase expenditures.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire, then, to address myself to the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, under the law as it now exists, if an officer of the United States Navy who is under sixty-two years of age becomes disabled to a degree supposed at the time to be incurable, he is transferred from the active list and placed upon the retired list. Now, this amendment proposes to require that if at any time after such transfer it can be shown that the disability which had been supposed to be incurable is curable, and if the officer becomes relieved from the disability, he shall then be ordered back to active service, and take the place which he occupied under his commission previous to the order for his retirement.

It is shown that a great many officers now on the retired list are in this situation: While they are drawing half pay and performing no service, many of them are active, energetic, patriotic officers, who are exceedingly desirous to be reinstated in active service under their old commissions. Under the law as it now exists they are debarred from this privilege.

There is another class of officers who may be said to be indolent, who are disinclined to go upon the active list, though the disability for which they were retired has been entirely cured and they are physically able to return to their original places. Individuals of this class should be compelled to take their former positions and be subject to the orders of the Department on the active list.

If this amendment be adopted, it will exercise a most excellent influence upon both these classes of officers. The officer who, his disability being removed, desires to return to active service will be permitted to do so; an officer of the other class who is indisposed to return to active service, although physically qualified to do so, will be required to return to active duty under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy.

As to the position taken by the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. TALBOTT], that this amendment increases expenditures, allow me to say that it does just the reverse; it decreases expenditures to this extent: If an officer who has been retired is reinstated upon the active list he takes the place which would otherwise require another officer drawing full pay, and the Government thereby saves the amount of the retired pay. I submit to the Chair that this explanation is sufficient to justify the overruling of the point of order. Having briefly stated the merits of the amendment and also my position in reference to the point of order, I submit the matter to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clearly of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Training Station, Coasters Harbor Island, Rhode Island (for apprentices): For dredging channels, repairs to main causeway, roads, and grounds, extending sea wall, and the employment of such labor as may be necessary for the proper care and preservation of the same; for repairs to wharf and sea wall; for repairs and improvements on buildings, heating, lighting, and furniture for same; books and stationery, freight, and other contingent expenses; purchase of food and maintenance of live stock, and mail wagon, and attendance on same, $30,000; for hospital for station, $20,000; in all, $50,000.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I hope the chairman of the committee [Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland] will explain the paragraph just read.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I suppose that the item which the gentleman wants explained is the appropriation of $20,000 for "hospital for station." This hospital is designed for naval apprentices. There is a training ship for these boys; and they are also sometimes kept on shore. Some time ago an epidemic broke out at this training station, where these boys are kept until they are detailed to duty on shipboard. In view of the sicknesses which sometimes occur, it has been deemed necessary to build a hospital for these boys; and we propose to appropriate for that purpose $20,000.

The estimate of the Bureau covered $125,000 for barracks and $20,000 for a hospital. We disallowed the item for barracks, but allowed this for the hospital, because we did not think it proper that these boys when sick should be kept on the training ship or in the barracks. Sometimes, when sick, they have been cared for in an old poorhouse, which was fitted up for the purpose. We think this appropriation for a hospital is entirely proper. This is the only new item in this paragraph.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but was interrupted by—

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill (because I feel quite sure that he would not have the committee vote upon anything that has not been explained) why it is that the appropriation under the head of "Equipment of Vessels" on page 10 has been increased $188,000 over the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

A MEMBER. We have passed that long ago.

Mr. SAYERS. I know that; but I suppose the gentleman will not hesitate to inform the committee why it has been asked to vote this increased expenditure.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am frank to state in about half a second to the gentleman from Texas that it is because of the new vessels going into commission in the Navy.

Mr. SAYERS. Is that the only reason?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Well, that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all.

Mr. MONEY. Well, we have passed over it anyway.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, Sacketts Harbor, N. Y.: For one ship keeper, at $366 per annum.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some inquiry as to this naval station at Sacketts Harbor, for which an appropriation is made here of $366 per annum. I ask the chairman of the committee if, as a matter of fact, there is a naval station there, or dockyard, or anything of the kind, or any need for the ship keeper?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. This is the provision for a ship keeper at Sacketts Harbor?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Well, I will be very frank with the gentleman from Kansas, and tell him that I have not personally examined the matter. This is the usual appropriation that comes recommended by the Department. I did not make personal inquiry, but suppose the ship keeper is there.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will move to strike it out unless some reason can be assigned for retaining it in the bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not believe there is any ship there to keep, and hence no need for the ship keeper.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am just told by a gentleman who knows, that there is a ship keeper there and a ship.

Mr. SIMPSON. Under our revised treaty with Great Britain and Canada we have but one vessel on the lakes; that is the steamer Michigan—

Mr. MONEY. That is the vessel.

Mr. SIMPSON. But she is never at Sacketts Harbor, I think.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. That is the ship to which reference is made in this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I object in the name of the State of New York to striking out an appropriation of this kind without being able to say a word in defense of the proposition. Why should it be stricken out, I ask the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SIMPSON. Why, there is no ship there, and no need of a keeper. It seems plain enough.

Mr. BARTLETT. How do you know that there is no ship there?

Mr. SIMPSON. I have just been trying to get the information.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you of your own knowledge say that there is no ship there?

Mr. SIMPSON. I have asked the chairman of the committee, and got the information from him that there was not.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. No; the gentleman asked me if I knew the facts in connection with this matter, and at the moment I stated that I had not made personal inquiry; but have since been informed that there is a ship there and that the amount recommended here is necessary.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to know what ship is there?

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from Kansas is so strenuous a guardian of the public moneys, how does it happen that he allowed a million dollars to be passed through the House yesterday without raising his voice in opposition to the increase of pensions to the Mexican and Indian soldiers?

Mr. SIMPSON. Because I thought that a just proposition. These men are in life—in existence. But here is a provision to pay a ship keeper where there is no ship.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why should pensions be increased forty-five years after the close of the war? Is it not simply taking the money from the taxpayers and giving it away where there is no necessity for it?

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, that is a question for each man to determine for himself when he comes to vote on the proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. And yet you think proper to rise and object to so small an appropriation as $366 a year for the services of a man to take charge of this establishment at Sacketts Harbor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me ask the gentleman this question, since he has referred to pensions: Does he think it wrong to pay these pensions?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it wrong to increase a pension from $8 to $12 a month nearly half a century after the close of the war, and for that reason I voted against it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman think it will make it right to vote for another wrong? According to his logic that would seem to be a necessary result.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it right in this case. But the gentleman from Kansas poses as the guardian of the Treasury, and yet he allowed this vast sum to be taken out without a protest.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York also what he knows personally of the ship at this point.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know that the presumption is in favor of the report of the committee, and the onus is on you to show that it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask a vote on the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on this question.

I expect, after listening to the discussion on this bill, to vote for the provision for battle ships. That we may have lasting peace, that we may care for and protect our citizens in all lands, that we may uphold and sustain the dignity of the Government, we must have a Navy that will command respect; arbitration is then practical, and peace largely assured. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] the other day, that it is greater to live for one's country than to die for one's country. While we all concede that the highest civilization comes from peace and its pursuits; while all concede that the highest point that the human race can attain must come with the development of peace and in times of peace, yet I can not subscribe to the sentiment, as I understand it, expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is greater to live for one's country than to die for one's country.

The doctrine that the gentleman asserts, taken in a general sense, is the doctrine that leads to servitude. Never has a people been rescued from servitude, from bondage, from tyrannical rule, from slavery, by advocating the doctrine that to live in peace is greater honor than to die for country.

Mr. Chairman, I believe, in the first place, for it to be an honor to live for a country it must be a government that is worth living for, and a government that is worth living for to save is worth dying for, and to die for it is the greater honor. A government is not worth living for that does not bring freedom to its people, that does not give every man an equal chance with every other man, that is not a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. It is no honor to live for a tyrannical and oppressive government, and to overthrow such a government is, in my opinion, the greatest honor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] to a few of the declarations of our forefathers and our patriots in regard to the honor due to men who die for their country. It is simply the gentleman's proposition which he here asserted, that it is more honorable to live for one's country than to die for one's country, that I desire to combat. I can do it in no other way so well as by calling attention to sentiments expressed upon this question by men whose memories we honor. I simply desire to reiterate the proposition that it is no honor to live for a government that is tyrannical and oppressive, and that it is an unparalleled honor to die to overthrow such a government in order that we may have freedom for a people.

I believe rather in the sentiment expressed by Sir William Jones than the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT]. His words are that a true government is made up of—

Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain;
Prevent the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain—
These constitute a state.

I would rather adopt the sentiments of Daniel Webster concerning Bunker Hill Monument in that immortal speech made at its completion, and I commend it to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Speaking to the vast concourse of people there assembled Mr. Webster said:

Its future auditories will be through successive generations of men as they rise up before it and gather around it.

Its speech will be of patriotism and courage; of civil and religious liberty; of free government; of moral improvement and elevation of mankind, and of the immortal memory of those who with heroic devotion have sacrificed their lives for their country.

I commend the sentiment of Josiah Quincy, jr., at the second Boston centennial, September, 1890, that—

Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom, freedom none but virtue, virtue none but knowledge.

Especially would I call attention to and warmly indorse, in conclusion, the words and sentiments of that distinguished American orator George William Curtis as to the minutemen of the Revolution, men who battled and died for liberty at the very threshold of the home of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT]. Breaking forth in eloquent inquiry, he proceeds to patriotically answer the same:

The minuteman of the Revolution, who was he?

He was the husband and father, who, bred to love liberty and to know that lawful liberty is the sole guarantee of peace and progress, left his plow in the furrow and his hammer on the bench and, kissing wife and children, marched to die or to be free.

He was the son and lover, the plain shy youth of the singing school and village choir, whose heart beat to arms for his country, who fell, though he could not say, with the old English cavalier—

"I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honor more."

He was the old, the middle-aged, and the young.

He was Captain Miles, of Concord, who said that he went to battle as he went to church.

He was Captain Davis, of Acton, who reproved his men for jesting on the march.

He was Deacon Josiah Haines, of Sudbury, 80 years old, who marched with his company to the old South Bridge at Concord, then joined in the hot pursuit to Lexington, and fell as gloriously as Warren at Bunker Hill.

He was James Hayward, of Acton, 22 years old, who marched with his company from Concord to Lexington, who raised his piece at the same moment with a British soldier, each exclaiming, "You are a dead man." The Britton dropped, shot through the heart, and James Hayward fell mortally wounded. "Father," he said, "I started with 40 balls. I have three left. Tell mother not to mourn too much for me, and tell her whom I love more than my mother I am not sorry I turned out."

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the death of these men and those like them who die for free government, who die that their own and succeeding generations may escape tyranny and oppression and thus develop the only true and highest Christian civilization known to men, perform the greatest, grandest, holiest service that falls to the lot of man.

It is only in such a government that the golden rule can truly govern the actions of men. And while I join the gentleman of Massachusetts in his desire for the victories of peace on earth and good will to men, and while I grant that this is the great goal toward which all nations and men should tend, because righteousness exalts nations and men, I can not agree that any greater honor can come to man than to die for his home and country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would like to ask whether the question or the fact has been settled that there is a ship at Sacketts Harbor?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. They ask for this amount for this man and I presume there is one there.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move to strike out the last word, so as to ascertain the fact. The question is whether there is a ship for that man to keep or not.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to say they have asked for $365 for years, and the commodore asks this year for $366 because there are more days, the next year being leap year; consequently there must be a man there or he would not want this appropriation made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. There is no doubt about the man. The question is whether there is a ship.

Mr. MONEY. We are not paying the ship; we are paying the man.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. You are paying a man to keep the ship.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Now, is there any ship? There are four or five gentlemen on the committee present; can some one state whether we have any ship there? Now, I want to move to put in the word "not," so that the provision shall be $366 to the man for "not" keeping the ship.

Mr. MONEY. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has accepted the amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We do not accept the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. My amendment takes precedence of the amendment that has been offered. The gentleman's amendment is to strike out, and mine is to make it read $366, for ship keeper "not" to keep the ship.

Mr. SAYERS. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was accepted by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. But that was all jocular. I am not in charge of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to let these two lines, 20 and 21, on page 14, go over, so that I may have an opportunity to make the inquiry; and if there is no ship there I will move to strike it out.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.: For one clerk, at $1,400; one messenger, at $2 per diem; one foreman laborer, at $4 per diem; one electrician, $1,000; in all, $4,284.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain why the appropriation of $500,000, which is a new one, is made, on page 7. I ask for an explanation.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We have passed that.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for an explanation. Now, I think when a committee calls upon us to appropriate $500,000 for a new purpose that the chairman of the committee ought to be willing to give an explanation.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman is kind to this House.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say that if the gentleman does not wish the question asked I will withdraw the request.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have made that explanation to this House. I have told the House that under the acts of 1890, 1891, and 1892, this Government subsidized certain vessels—the City of New York and City of Paris are two of them—at $3 a mile to carry the mails, with the proviso that, in case the Government needs them for war purposes, either as cruisers or transports, they shall be transferred to the Government upon a valuation to be ascertained by appraisers. I have told this House all that. Now, I told the committee that in case of an emergency and we wanted to use these vessels for naval purposes there is not a single gun at the disposal of the Navy Department to place upon them.

Mr. SAYERS. How many vessels are subsidized and between what ports are they sailing?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The City of New York and the City of Paris are now in commission, and I think the St. Louis will be soon. It is being built for the same purpose. It is to be subsidized. So is the St. Paul. I made that explanation to the House the other day.

Mr. SAYERS. I did not hear it. It must have been very brief. I have asked an explanation because it is an important question.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. In other words, it is nonsense to subsidize these steamers and give authority to get control of them if we are not to be in a condition to use them and can not supply them with guns and gun carriages.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman inform us as to the size of the guns they are to carry?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am told by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GEISSENHAINER] that they are to be 6-inch guns. I did not inquire very thoroughly into that.

Mr. SAYERS. Are these guns to be put upon these vessels as soon as they are made?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. My dear sir, you know they are not.

Mr. SAYERS. I did not know.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We mean just exactly what this bill means, and what common sense means, that they are to be kept as reserve guns for the use of these vessels in case we need them.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will ask the gentleman to make his motion with reference to some paragraph pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, this shows how much a Naval Committee with eight lawyers on it knows about the shipping interests of the United States, including the Navy. [Laughter.] They appropriate money for a ship keeper at Sacketts Harbor when they do not know whether there is a ship there or not; and now I propose to give another illustration of their knowledge in regard to these subsidized vessels that they want to appropriate half a million dollars to arm. What is the history of these four ships for which this armament is to be provided? We have two of them already nationalized by an act of Congress introduced by the gentleman from New York, Mr. COCKRAN. What does that mean? It means that those vessels, including the two that are to be built in the United States, are to receive as a subsidy from the Government of the United States $4 per mile, instead of $2, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. Two dollars.

Mr. SIMPSON. No, sir; $4 a mile. Now, what does that mean, Mr. Chairman? The distance between New York and Southampton is 3,047 miles. This subsidy will give $12,188 for every voyage that one of these steamers makes. If they make 53 voyages during the year that will produce $633,776. But suppose they do not make 53 voyages per year, or one voyage a week, the amount will probably be at least half a million dollars of subsidy which is to be paid by the taxpayers of the United States. Is not that a costly navy? Is not that a costly experiment in getting transports for time of war?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The legislation the gentleman refers to was not reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am aware of that.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. It was reported from another committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am aware of that; but I want to draw attention to the fact that after all that the Democrats have said about the Republicans passing subsidy bills they have outsubsidied the Republicans. By that legislation you have given a greater subsidy to this international line than was ever given by any government on the face of the earth. You have put to shame all the Republican legislation along that line; and now come the Committee on Naval Affairs proposing to add another half million dollars to arm these subsidized ships.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have a telegram from the Postmaster-General stating that the amount of contracts with these subsidized lines rescinded since March 4, 1893, is $1,398,528.

Now, the question I propound to the gentleman is this: If it be the policy of the Postmaster-General to rescind those contracts, why is it that the Committee on Naval Affairs report in this bill an item of $500,000 to arm those vessels?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I will answer that when the proper time comes. Meanwhile, I wish to say to the gentleman from Kansas that he is entirely mistaken in what he has said about the subsidy legislation. When the bill to which he refers was passed the Senate was controlled by Republicans, and the House too.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does that excuse the Democrats who control this House?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. My dear sir, I do not want to make any excuses for anybody or for doing what I consider to be my duty. I consider it to be my duty to report bills to maintain the American Navy, and I will do it whenever I have an opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I am merely drawing the attention of the House to what has been done. I am sure that very few members realized at the time of the passage of that bill naturalizing those vessels what it really meant. So here to-day we have passed this important paragraph in this bill with very few people on this floor realizing its meaning, yet it is an appropriation of another half million dollars to arm these subsidized vessels.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to call the attention of members to the fact that here is an item which appears for the first time on an appropriation bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs—an item to appropriate $500,000 to arm ships which may never need artillery. Gentlemen have denounced the subsidizing act of the Fifty-first Congress, and the Postmaster-General has rescinded contracts made under it; yet this committee, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, proposes to expend $500,000 to arm these fast-going ocean steamships belonging to private companies. Gentlemen do not object to paying Carnegie and the Bethlehem Iron Company five or six millions more and Cramp & Sons probably ten or twenty millions more for material and work that may never be utilized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph and have a vote upon it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Kansas. The pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: To complete the electric plant at the Boston Navy-Yard, including United States steamer Wabash, $1,500.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move to amend by adding to this paragraph the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. SAYERS. I observe the language of this paragraph is "to complete the electric plant at the Boston Navy-Yard, including United States steamer Wabash." Does that mean to complete the Wabash and also the electric plant?

Mr. MONEY. The electric plant is on the Wabash and in the navy-yard.

Mr. SAYERS. It does not so read.

Mr. MONEY. Oh, yes; it does. The Wabash is the receiving ship, and the electric plant supplies her with light.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-Yard, League Island, Pa.: For 200 linear feet of sea wall (continuation), 2,000 linear feet of light retaining wall (continuation), $30,000; dredging, $10,000; artesian wells, $9,000; sidewalks, $3,500; one deck scow, $2,000; for the construction of one steam tug, $30,000; in all, $74,500.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move to amend by striking out lines 16 and 17, down to the word "twenty," and inserting the words "continuation of sea wall."

Mr. SAYERS. I remember that in the Forty-ninth Congress the establishment of a navy-yard at League Island was refused. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether he can inform the Committee of the Whole how much money has been expended up to this time for that navy-yard and what will be the probable cost of completing it?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I could get the information for the gentleman, I suppose; but he has been here since the Forty-ninth Congress, and he ought to be better posted on these matters than I am.

Mr. SAYERS. That might be so if I were a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The chairman of the committee ought to be able to give us this information.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I do not suppose that any gentleman could answer offhand such a question.

Mr. SAYERS. I observe that the chairman of the committee [Mr. GEISSENHAINER] remains silent and does not inform us upon the subject.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: For extension of quay wall, $20,000; sand lighter, $2,000; derrick car, $1,000; repairs to granite dock, $15,000; one deck scow, $2,000; dredging in front of the navy-yard dock, $3,012; in all, $46,012.

Mr. TYLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 15, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to exchange such of the land at the navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., being part of a tract known as St. Helena (on the east side of the Elizabeth River), which the Government does not need, for a part of the adjoining tract known as Cedar Grove, and now belonging to private parties, upon such terms as may be determined upon by a board of officers accepted by the present owners of Cedar Grove, and approved by them, as may, in his opinion, serve the best interests of the Government."

Mr. SAYERS. If no member of the Committee on Naval Affairs will raise a point of order on this amendment, I will do so.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The committee does not object to it.

Mr. TYLER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not press his point of order. The effect of this amendment is to save expense. There is no appropriation coupled with the amendment; and its object is to prevent the necessity of an appropriation for the purchase of property which the Government should have. It now owns property there for which it has no use at this time.

Mr. SAYERS. I did not catch the language of the amendment, but—

Mr. TYLER. If the gentleman had understood the amendment I am quite sure he would not object.

Mr. SAYERS. Does it not provide that an exchange be made upon such terms as the Secretary of the Navy may think proper?

Mr. TYLER. It authorizes him, in his discretion, to make a certain exchange—to acquire other property, not by the expenditure of money, but by an exchange.

Mr. SAYERS. I object to giving so much "discretion."

Mr. TYLER. If the gentleman had heard the amendment he would have recognized that it is not open to objection.

Mr. MONEY. It does not involve the expenditure of a dollar.

Mr. SAYERS. I withdraw the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but was interrupted by—

Mr. SAYERS. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill as to the proposed dry dock at Algiers, La.

Mr. MONEY. We have passed that.

Mr. SAYERS. I know; but there is in the bill an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose, and I see that it is to cost ultimately $1,200,000. I want to know what is the necessity for expending this money for a dry dock at that location.

Mr. MEYER. I will state the reason. For many years it has been thought that the establishment of a dry dock somewhere on the Gulf coast was a military necessity, and would further afford vastly favorable facilities to the commercial marine which gathers there and plies its commerce from all parts of the world.

Mr. SAYERS. Is Algiers on the Gulf coast?

Mr. MEYER. It is opposite New Orleans, the greatest port of the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. SAYERS. How far is New Orleans from the Gulf coast?

Mr. MEYER. One of the main advantages of this site is that it is on the Mississippi River, 110 miles above its mouth; and this great stream brings to it every article of material for the construction, the provisioning, and the fitting out of ships, and its proximity to our great city insures it plenty of labor, both skilled and ordinary, and ample railway facilities. Being well up the river, it can easily be defended against hostile ships or troops, and the establishment will be one more step toward the protection of our seaboard, the need of which is daily becoming more impressively obvious.

Mr. SIMPSON. Vessels of how deep draft can go up to Algiers?

Mr. MEYER. Thirty feet.

Mr. SIMPSON. Do you mean 30 feet of water at the bar in high water?

Mr. MEYER. Thirty feet of water at all times.

Mr. SIMPSON. Not 30 feet?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir; 30 feet. I have seen myself a vessel drawing 27 feet go up there without trouble.

Mr. MEYER. The contract under which the Government is operating now with the successors or heirs of the late Capt. J. B. Eads requires a channel of not less than 27 feet at all times.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to say a word about this matter—

Mr. MEYER. I have not yet yielded the floor.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this, that there were two commissions appointed by Congress in pursuance of the widespread demand for a dry dock somewhere along the Gulf coast. The first of these commissions examined every point on the coast—Galveston, Mobile, Pensacola, Sabine Pass, and points on the South Atlantic coast—and, after a careful and thorough investigation, they submitted a very exhaustive and able report and made the following recommendations on November 19, 1889:

After carefully weighing all the advantages and disadvantages of Algiers as a site for a naval station the commission is of opinion that, while the spot is not an ideal one, no other place in the Gulf compares with it in the advantages offered, and that the advantages are so many and so great and outweigh the disadvantages to such an extent that the commission has no hesitation in recommending the location of a navy-yard and dry docks at the present Government reservation at Algiers, La.

Shortly after this report had been made the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. B. F. Tracy, appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and recommended that a dry dock be established at Algiers. A bill making an appropriation for the establishment of a dry dock at Algiers was thereupon reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By virtue of a provision in the naval appropriation act approved June 30, 1890, another commission was appointed by the President "to select a suitable site, having due regard to commercial and naval interests, for a dry dock at some point on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith."

The President appointed upon this Commission Capt. Francis M. Bunce, United States Navy; Maj. H. C. Hasbrouck, Fourth Artillery, United States Army; R. M. G. Brown, United States Navy, and Messrs. Sidney Perham and David T. Littler.

The Commission was organized on December 5, 1890, and after visiting the various points which they deemed advisable in order to carry out intelligently the requirements of the order for their appointment, and having due regard for commercial and naval interests and the emergencies which might arise in the event of war, they submitted their report on March 9, 1891. The commission say they made a careful study of the commercial routes to and from the Gulf of Mexico, and searched for the best position for a naval defense of them and of its coasts. They learned from the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department that—

In view of the increased size of the vessels now being constructed and contemplated, a dry dock must be at least 600 feet long, 97 feet wide at the top, 66 feet in the clear at the entrance, with a depth of at least 26 feet, and of sufficient stability to support a load of 15,000 tons.

Upon inquiry of the Chief of Ordnance of the Navy Department it was ascertained that—

The larger guns of a modern battle ship will range upward of 8 miles at the extreme elevation permitted by the mounting, the ship being on an even keel, and by heeling the ship to increase the elevation this range could probably be increased to at least 10 miles, and, with the largest guns afloat, even to 12 miles.

Whence the commission concluded that the requisites for a dry dock were—

A clear channel to the sea of a depth of at least 26 feet, stability of foundation to support a load of 15,000 tons, and protection by a distance of 12 miles, or by an intervening elevation of the ground from gun fire from the sea.

After a careful study of the charts of the Gulf of Mexico and the waters connected therewith the commission proceeded to visit Key West, Tampa, Pensacola, Mobile, Port Eads, New Orleans, Galveston, and Aransas Pass. They declare that everywhere the greatest interest was manifested in the work of the commission; that they were received by committees of citizens and furnished with every facility to aid them in their investigations.

The report contains a clear statement of the advantages and disadvantages of seventeen different points on the Gulf of Mexico, and after a full examination the commission reached the conclusion that—

The South Pass of the Mississippi River affords the only entrance 26 feet deep to a port or harbor on the Gulf of Mexico or waters connected therewith far enough from the sea to be safe from gun fire.

They quote the opinion of Gen. C. B. Comstock, colonel of engineers, United States Army, and president of the Mississippi River Commission, to the effect that "the channel at the South Pass jetties is permanent, in the sense that it will be possible to maintain a channel there of at least 26 feet depth at low water in the river as long as the jetties are maintained to deep water and the damages from storms repaired," an opinion in which the commission, after careful examination, concur.

The commission report that—

New Orleans is the only port on the Gulf coast or the waters connected therewith where the three primary requisites for a dry dock are to be found. It is situated about 100 miles up the river. It is the largest city in the Gulf States. From the entrance of South Pass to the city a depth of more than 26 feet can be carried at all times. The soil of the river banks in its vicinity at the surface light is, from 2 to 4 feet below the surface, of clay or clay and sand, increasing in density and solidity with the depth of the boring or excavation made, insuring a foundation amply sufficient to support a load of 15,000 tons in the dock by the employment of the usual methods in its construction.

This port has other and great advantages as the site. Being the greatest center of population of the Gulf States, labor, skilled or otherwise, can be obtained at short notice. Its foreign commerce is greater than that of all the other Gulf ports together, last year reaching 2,034,072 tons; all others, 1,907,892 tons. A fresh-water harbor, its water communication with the interior by the Mississippi and its tributaries is nowhere in the world equaled, and this is supplemented by six great railroad lines, which, with their connections, reach every part of the country. Defense of these by the whole power of the nation is assured. It is a military necessity. Fresh water for all uses is supplied by filtering the river water, by the rainfall, and by artesian wells. Epidemic diseases of foreign origin are prevented by a strict system of quarantine regulations, and the general health of the city is as good as that of any Gulf port. A supply of iron, coal, or other material required can always be had at short notice and at cheap rates.

In conclusion the commission says, for the reasons already given:

The commission therefore select this as the most suitable site for a dry dock on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith.

The Secretary of the Navy, Hon. B. F. Tracy, in his communication forwarding the report of the commission to the President, says:

I approve of the selection made of a site for the dry dock at Algiers, on the right bank of the Mississippi River, in view of the conditions found by the commission to exist there. The naval reservation at this point is too limited in extent for the proper location and use of the dry dock, and it will be necessary to purchase additional lands adjoining.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEYER. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Was not Algiers simply selected because the Representative from that section was on the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. McALEER. The Committee on Naval Affairs does not do that kind of work.

Mr. SAYERS. I am not speaking of this committee.

Mr. MEYER. This committee had nothing to do with it. Algiers was designated at a time when the Representative from the district was not on the Naval Committee.

Mr. SAYERS. But the member at that time was on that committee, was he not?

Mr. MEYER. It was before I was a member of the committee. Since then, however, I have never failed to keep its merits as a suitable location before my colleagues.

Mr. MONEY (to Mr. SAYERS). You were once a member of that committee yourself, I believe?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. And did you not put in some good work for Texas?

Mr. SAYERS. No more than for any other part of the country.

A MEMBER. Because you had no water there, perhaps.

Mr. HUDSON. Can somebody tell me how far Pensacola is from Algiers?

Mr. MEYER. I would state that Pensacola has two bars, the inner and outer bar, and her deepest water is from 20 to 21 feet—not sufficient for any of our modern war ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEYER. Another advantage offered by Algiers is its convenient proximity to the coal and iron fields of Alabama and Pennsylvania, from which supplies can be secured at all times at the lowest cost, to be used for the repairs and work of the establishment.

Mr. PENCE. Was this point recommended by both commissions?

Mr. MEYER. Yes, sir; by both.

Another very important advantage possessed by New Orleans, which should not be ignored, is the fact that the water is fresh. In such water the metal hulls of the modern warships now being constructed for the naval service can easily be preserved when the vessels are not in service, an advantage not possessed by tide-water ports.

The ships not in commission can be laid up at such a yard with every assurance that their hulls would be preserved in good condition.

Our steel war ships require more frequent docking than their wooden predecessors. They are not sheathed, and rust, barnacles, and weeds accumulate rapidly on their hulls, particularly when they lie in port in tropical waters for weeks together.

Unless painted and scraped at least three times a year the marine growth greatly diminish their speed and a much larger consumption of coal is needed in their cruising.

In case of war, from a naval and military point of view it is essential that any fleet charged with the duty of protecting the commercial interests and the coasts and harbors of the Gulf of Mexico should be so placed as to cover the commercial routes and the approaches to the coasts and there remain, intercepting and destroying the enemy should he attempt to endanger the safety of either.

The site selected is the center of the commercial and naval interests of the Gulf of Mexico. It must be our settled policy to hold this line as a naval base. Its importance was first brought to the attention of the Government by Commodore John Rogers as early as 1829.

The lack of adequate facilities for naval repairs and supplies on the thousands of miles of coast south of Norfolk and along the entire Gulf coast has been made particularly manifest during the last few years, and it is the part of prudence to defer remedying the want no longer.

But, Mr. Chairman, the question of the distinguished gentleman from Texas comes at a very late period. Congress determined the usefulness and need for this dry dock by two distinct acts, as evidenced in the naval appropriation bills of the second sessions of the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, and he need not fear that this money, proposed to be appropriated in furtherance of the great work already determined upon, will be unwisely or unserviceably applied.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that it is proposed to commence the construction of a dry dock at a cost of $1,250,000 at this point, which is not on the coast, but opposite to the city of New Orleans, and at the same time to maintain the Pensacola Navy-Yard. Before the completion of this dock the Government will have expended two or three million dollars. I only want to call attention to the fact.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Well, Mr. Chairman, we have already passed over this paragraph.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to ask the attention of the committee for a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, it is a singular state of things that gentlemen who are opposing any legislation looking to the building or maintenance of a proper navy for the United States on the floor of the House should offer such contradictory reasons for the position they occupy. Now, we had a speech from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] a day or two ago, and he objected to the location of the dockyard at Puget Sound, directly on the waters of the Pacific Ocean; and why? Because, he said, he was afraid the British would come right across and capture it.

Now, the fact is that in case of war with Great Britain we would go right over and capture Esquimaux. Now, however, comes the gentleman from Texas and objects to a dockyard that is put out of the reach of the British on the Mississippi River opposite New Orleans, and his objection is because it is not on the Gulf or the ocean. Why, is not New Orleans a seaport? Do not vessels of every nation in the world stand to-day alongside of her wharves and levees loading and unloading?

Some question has also been raised by the gentleman from Kansas, and I believe the gentleman from Texas as well, as to the depth of the water there. Do not these gentlemen know that there is not a harbor on the coast from Port Royal to Corpus Christi that has as deep water as New Orleans? There is not a single port for a distance of over 5,000 miles which has better facilities or better draft than New Orleans, and it is fully equal to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, or any of the Atlantic seaports.

It has a great custom-house there. It has ships there from every nation on the face of the earth that trades with the United States, and it seems that we can not get a dockyard anywhere that will suit these gentlemen of the opposition. If we put it on the seacoast they are afraid the British will capture it. If we put it up at New Orleans they are afraid of something else.

Mr. Chairman, we can not build dry docks without the money to do it, and my honorable friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] knows that the amount named is not too large to build a first-class dry dock. The gentleman is not only opposed to building ships for the Navy, but he is opposed to building dry docks and stations to maintain the Navy which we already have. What are you going to do with a navy without dry docks? If we are not to have places where ships can be careened and repaired you will soon lose the ships.

Mr. SAYERS. How many navy-yards and docks have we now besides this in the United States?

Mr. MONEY. We want one on the Gulf coast.

Mr. SAYERS. We are not talking about the Gulf coast.

Mr. MONEY. I am talking about the Gulf coast. The gentleman from Texas talks as if the fleets of the United States would be forever concentrated upon our Eastern seaboard. Does he not know that the very next difficulty that will invite the attention of the gentleman will be an appropriation for a fleet to maintain our communication through the isthmus? Are we not about to undertake an interoceanic canal there?

Mr. SAYERS. I hope not.

Mr. MONEY. You hope not! You hope there will not be any navy or any navy-yards?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not desire such an expenditure of money as the building of that canal will call for.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The gentleman asks how many navy-yards and dry docks we now have. In reply I will say that we have 16. The following is from the report of the Bureau of Yards and Docks for 1891. Naval stations and docks, etc., have since been added at Port Royal, S. C., and at Puget Sound, which are not included in the statement:

There are 14 navy-yards and stations, exclusive of the Naval Home, covering 2,700 acres of ground, with 499 workshops, store and ship houses, 7.18 miles of wharf line, 10 dry docks, 19 marine railways and launching ways, a large number of offices, many miles of railway, of water, gas, and steam pipes, 150 horses and oxen, and 100 houses for officers' residences, to be maintained by this Bureau.

The deterioration upon an unoccupied building or dock is as great, or greater, than when occupied. If these yards and stations are never to be used for naval purposes, true economy would be to sell them. If, however, the Government is to hold on to them for an emergency, sound policy requires that they should be kept in repair. Another reason for increase of expenses of this Bureau is that many improvements incidental to modern ships and a new navy have been made, such as the three new timber dry docks at New York, Norfolk, and League Island; also the growing importance of Port Royal, Key West, and of New London for coaling stations. A dock is being constructed at the former. These make it necessary to have increased appropriations.

I submit the following table, showing the value of the various properties:

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, we have had this same question about this dockyard at New Orleans before. It was up in the Fifty-second Congress. Now let us see as to the fact. There is already a dockyard at Pensacola, Fla.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. There is no amendment pending to the bill. We had already passed this paragraph.

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman is not afraid of a little discussion.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am not, but I do not want to get off the bill. We had passed this paragraph.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will confine my remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The gentleman can not do that on this paragraph.

Mr. SICKLES. I make the point of order that the paragraph has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, who moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMPSON. I was about to say we have already one of the finest dockyards in the United States at Pensacola, Fla., on the Gulf coast, within five or six hundred miles of this proposed dry dock. That dry dock cost the American people four or five million dollars, I think.

Mr. MONEY. What is the depth of the water there?

Mr. SIMPSON. There is as much water there to-day as there is in New Orleans.

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman does not answer the question.

Mr. SIMPSON. And it would not cost one-fifteenth as much to deepen the water there, and it can be made a much better harbor than there is at New Orleans.

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman declines to answer my question.

Mr. SIMPSON. The people at New Orleans are continually telling the country through the press and otherwise that there is 30 feet of water at New Orleans. There never has been 30 feet of water there, and I do not believe there ever will be.

Mr. MONEY. I saw a ship go through the jetties there drawing 27 feet myself.

Mr. SIMPSON. They say they have 30 feet of water there, but that depth exists only on paper. Here is a proposition to expend more than a million dollars to build a dry dock away up the river at New Orleans, when we already have a much better one, if it is put in repair, at Pensacola. I think this is a useless expenditure of money.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows: New buildings: For quarters for observers, four buildings, at $7,500 each, $30,000.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I am authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 21, strike out line 25, and on page 22, strike out lines 1 and 2, and insert in lieu thereof:

"New buildings: For quarters for observers, four buildings, at $5,000 each, $20,000."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the entire clause.

Four buildings at $7,500 each are proposed. It is now proposed to reduce the cost of the buildings to $5,000. The Observatory has been in existence for years—

Mr. MONEY. Oh, it is quite new.

Mr. SAYERS. I know, but it has been there for some years, and we are to expend $20,000 in order that the observers may have quarters there. It is a wasteful expenditure of public money.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact this appropriation of $30,000 was passed upon favorably by the committee, but we afterwards considered that we could build four houses there for $20,000, and everybody who has had the pleasure of renting or building a house in the city of Washington knows that $5,000 will build only a cheap house. Now, as to the necessity for these buildings, they are to be occupied by civilians, gentlemen whose work is at night, as the business of taking astronomical observations can not very well be conducted in the daytime. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Is not this appropriation for dwelling houses? Mr. MONEY. Yes; for dwelling houses for these gentlemen. They are required to be there at night, and they can not well live elsewhere. They are engaged in making astronomical observations for the Government—that is, for the use of the whole Navy everywhere on the face of the globe. There is not a man in the Navy anywhere that does not have the benefit of the observations that are made by these gentlemen and of their skilled work; and it is ridiculous—I speak, of course, with perfect respect to my friend from Texas—to object to an appropriation of this sort.

I want to say another thing, Mr. Chairman. It is just as much in order to make an appropriation to build these houses as it is to make an appropriation to build houses at the barracks for officers, or at the Naval Academy, or at Newport, or at any other place; just as much in order and just as necessary in every particular. Another thing: These gentlemen of the Navy for whom we are required to build these houses do not stand in the same attitude as officers of the Army. These officers are allowed commutation for their quarters, but it is not so in the Navy, and therefore it is necessary for us to erect residences for the men who are engaged in this skilled work of far-reaching importance, and I hope the gentleman from Texas will not insist on his objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] thinks it ridiculous for me to try to save the people $20,000—

Mr. MONEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not.

Mr. SAYERS. But I will say to the gentleman that I have offered this amendment in all seriousness. There is no necessity for building these houses for people to live in at night when they ought to be watching the stars. [Laughter.] That is what the gentleman says these people are there for. Why was not this estimate brought in here before? Take this bill from beginning to end, on almost every page of it you will find items that the committee would not have dared to propose in the face of an election. [Laughter.] Seven thousand five hundred dollars apiece for houses for four gentleman to live in—

Mr. MONEY. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; the committee got scared and reduced it to $5,000, but at first they wanted $7,500.

Mr. MONEY. We did not get scared by the gentleman from Texas. We agreed to the reduction before the bill came in here at all.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON]—

Mr. MONEY. No. Before the gentleman from Tennessee had anything to say about it.

Mr. SAYERS. I say, Mr. Chairman, you may take this bill all through and you will find it covered with scabs and sores. [Laughter.] It appropriates money that it never would have appropriated if there was an election coming on. A hundred thousand dollars for a dry dock at Algiers!

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I believe the gentleman claims credit for cutting down the appropriations $28,000,000 in the last session.

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. I do not claim credit for anything.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I thought you did; but I did not see any good results from it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. No. I do not claim credit for anything. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland, during the closing hours of his public service, had better be building a monument which will enable him to come to Congress two years hence. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. That would be a good result. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that members of Congress have to come here at night sometimes, and, therefore, why not build houses for them?

Mr. SAYERS. In all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation ought not to be made to build houses for the computers at the Naval Observatory.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, my friend has more than once told us that we would not have reported this bill immediately preceding an election. It was not for him to call us to account.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly; but you would not have done it.

Mr. MONEY. We might bring in bills, as many as we please, and the Democratic party could not fare any worse than under his leadership and cheeseparing. That is his work.

Mr. SAYERS. And I am going to continue the work until the 4th day of March; and if the gentleman wants to pass such bills through the House as this he will have to pass them with the full knowledge on the part of members as to their contents.

Mr. MONEY. Of course we explain the contents ourselves. We will not trouble you with that.

Mr. SAYERS. The House should know the character of the bills that are submitted.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the estimate was for $50,000, and we have reduced the amount for the buildings at this new Naval Observatory. That is a work of the Government; and it is found to be in the interest of science that these naval observers should be on the spot all the time; and for that reason we voted for the buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SAYERS. I offered an amendment to the amendment; to strike out the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order first to perfect the text.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAINES. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I now ask for a vote on my amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 43.

Mr. SIMPSON. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 60.

Mr. SIMPSON. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all for the new Naval Observatory, $42,000.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Clerk will make the clerical corrections made necessary by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery: For freight, expressage on medical stores, tools, ferringes, transportation of sick to hospital, transportation of insane patients; care, transportation, and burial of the dead; advertising; telegraphing; rent of telephones; purchase of books and stationery; binding of medical records, unbound books, and pamphlets; postage and purchase of stamps for foreign service; expenses attending the medical board of examiners; rent of rooms for naval dispensary; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary and hygienic instruction; purchase and repairs of wagons and harness; purchase of feed for horses and cows; trees, plants, garden tools, and seeds; furniture and incidental articles for the museum of hygiene, naval dispensary, Washington; naval laboratory, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks, surgeons' offices and dispensaries at navy-yards and naval stations; washing for medical department at museum of hygiene, naval dispensary, Washington; naval laboratory and department of instruction, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks, dispensaries at navy-yards and naval stations and ships and rendezvous; buildings and grounds of the United States Naval Museum of Hygiene, and for minor repairs on said buildings and grounds as may be required to properly receive and preserve the exhibits, and all other necessary contingent expenses, $25,000.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, line 21, insert after the word "dead" the following:

"Including the expense of disintering and transportation and burial at his late home in Cherokee, Iowa, of the remains of William A. Lathrop, who died in the service on the United States steamer Concord at Wuhu, China."

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I want briefly to explain the amendment. [Cries of "All right!"] Then I will not detain the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.: In general storehouses: Two bookkeepers, at $1,200 each; two assistant bookkeepers, at $1,017.35 each; one bill clerk, at $1,000; one assistant bill clerk, at $750; one receiving clerk, at $942; one assistant receiving clerk, at $730. In yard pay office: One writer, at $1,017.35; one clerk to board of labor employment, $1,200; in all, $10,033.75.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to call the attention of the committee to the last item for board of labor employment. There is no other branch of the public service which has such a board. I wish the gentleman in charge of the bill would explain the duty and the necessity of this board and of their having a clerk. Now, I have heard a great deal about the board in the navy-yard in Washington—

Mr. TYLER. But this is for the navy-yard at Norfolk.

Mr. SAYERS. I have heard a good deal about the board of employment here.

Mr. MONEY. But this is the navy-yard at Norfolk.

Mr. SAYERS. So much the worse, if it is for that small place.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is a fraud on the Government.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to strike out lines 5 and 6, down to the word "dollars."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, lines 5 and 6, strike out the following language:

"One clerk to board of labor employment, $1,200."

Mr. TYLER. I wish the gentleman from Texas, before he insists on his amendment, would just listen briefly to what I have to say.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. TYLER. If the result of the amendment were to wipe out boards of labor employment I would not raise my voice in opposition to it; but the fact of it is that the board of labor employment is a board that has been established in every navy-yard in the United States.

Mr. SAYERS. Is it true, I wish to ask the gentleman right now, because I have had some experience with this board of labor employment—

Mr. MONEY. Did you ask to have a man appointed?

Mr. SAYERS. I did not ask to have a man appointed. A Union soldier who had been discharged by the board of labor employment came to me and asked me to have him reinstated. He was not from my State. That was the only connection I had with the board.

Mr. TYLER. I supposed the gentleman from Texas was going to ask a question, not make an argument.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know the duties of the board of employment and how it operates.

Mr. TYLER. Their duty is to select laborers for work in the navy-yards of the United States in the building of ships—

Mr. SAYERS. They do not build ships at the Washington Navy-Yard.

Mr. TYLER. I am not speaking about the Washington Navy-Yard. If the gentleman will examine, he will see that this matter has relation to the Norfolk Navy-Yard.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, this provision ought to be stricken out, and also all similar provisions elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. TYLER. I am speaking for the Norfolk Navy-Yard. The gentleman is evidently not aware of the fact that there is already a clerk to the board of labor employment at the Norfolk Navy-Yard; but he is a per diem clerk, not an annual clerk, and I want to make him an annual clerk.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. TYLER. There will be no loss to the Government. The increased expenditure will be very slight. I am perfectly willing to be frank with the gentleman and say that the increase will be about $175 a year. This clerk, to my knowledge, has as much labor to perform in clerical matters as any other clerk in that yard. Men who are receiving $1,400 or $1,500 a year as clerks there are doing no more than this man does, who receives about $1,000. He is at work all the time; and as long as you have a board of labor employment you must have a clerk for that board.

Mr. SICKLES. We do not want any board of labor employment.

Mr. TYLER. If gentlemen desire to do away with these boards, they must amend the regulations that are now operating. And I will say to the gentleman that I offered a bill here last year for the purpose of doing away with these boards of labor employment. I shall be glad to have his cooperation in passing the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. This is a matter of departmental regulation, is it not?

Mr. TYLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. And if we take away from these gentlemen their clerical force they will not do the work themselves?

Mr. TYLER. You can not very well do that unless you examine very minutely the contingent funds which are under the control of the Department.

Mr. SAYERS. That is the trouble.

Mr. TYLER. This expense is paid out of a general fund apportioned among the several bureaus in the yards.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, these boards of labor employment which have been established at various navy-yards in this country were first created under the administration of Mr. Secretary Tracy. He thought this step was for the good of the service. It was rather in the direction of civil-service reform. These boards have been unpopular with members of Congress, because members can not procure through them the employment of mechanics or laborers. I do not say all can not; but some can not. This system, however, which was established by a Republican Secretary of the Navy, has been continued by Mr. Secretary Herbert.

It is manifest that unless the system is to be radically changed, unless we are to interfere with these regulations established after careful consideration by two successive Secretaries of the Navy, we must allow clerk hire for these boards. If gentlemen wish to pass a bill providing that the Secretary of the Navy shall not have power to establish these boards, that is another matter. But it is clear that as long as these boards of labor employment exist they should have clerical assistance; we should make an allowance for clerks to aid them in their work.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about these boards of labor employment except this: Last year an employee who had been discharged—he was not from my State or district; I believe he was from Pennsylvania—came to me and asked me to see whether I could get him reinstated. I never had seen the man before, but I went to the Navy Department and called attention to his case. I never could get a proper investigation of the causes of his discharge. He was a good workman who had been thrown out of employment. He is not a Democrat and is not from my State. As I have stated, he was unknown to me until he came to me with a letter.

Mr. RAY. If the man had belonged to your party you would not have had the least difficulty in securing his reinstatement.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman seems to be on very good terms with the Navy Department.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Naval Committee whether these boards of labor employment are established by statute or by regulation?

Mr. TYLER. By regulation.

Mr. SICKLES. Now, I have had some experience within the last year or two with these boards of labor employment. I do not know of any institution in this country to-day that is so arbitrary and so impenetrable to any ordinary human inquiry or investigation as this bureau of labor employment in the Navy Department. I have had the same difficulty with it which has been encountered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. At the solicitation of many worthy mechanics I have endeavored to ascertain again and again why it was that men were dismissed from employment, competent and good men, and have never received a satisfactory reply.

I can address the President of the United States and get an answer; I can address the Commanding General of the Army and get a reply, but I can not get any information under any circumstances from the labor employment board in the Navy Department. I repeat, then, that it is the most despotic, arbitrary, and impenetrable power in the Government to-day, and I think it ought to exist no longer, for I certainly see no good purpose that it can serve. If, then, it does not exist by statute—

Mr. CAMPBELL. It does not.

Mr. SICKLES. It should not exist at all, and I am opposed to giving it any more clerks or any more facilities for lording it over men having business with it. I am against it, and would like to see some action taken here to change it and take from this board the powers which it now exercises with such an arbitrary sway. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill if there are any clerks to the boards of labor employment at the other navy-yards?

Mr. TYLER. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that at the Washington Navy-Yard, I understand, there is a clerk called the clerk of the equipment department, who does the work for the labor employment board and receives $1,000 per annum.

Mr. MALLORY. Why, I would ask, if there are clerks for the labor employment boards in other yards are they not provided for in this bill?

Mr. TYLER. I can not answer that. I know, however, that there are some employed. At Mare Island, for instance, the clerk receives $5 per day as a special laborer detailed to do the clerical work for the labor employment board. He is paid out of the contingent fund; and it seems to me it would be better to put him on the roll as a clerk to the board rather than to pay him out of this fund.

Mr. SAYERS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Navy Department allows the contingent fund to be used in the payment of clerical service in this way?

Mr. TYLER. It is not improperly paid, but these clerks are usually detailed for the purpose and are paid out of the contingent fund.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Virginia is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I wish to ask him, in view of the statement he has just made, if the Navy Department sanctions the use of the contingent fund for the payment of a clerical force not authorized by law. Do I understand that clerks are detailed without authority of law and paid out of the contingent fund? That is what we want to know. Let us get to the bottom of this thing, and, for my part, I am thankful to the gentleman from Virginia that, in taking care of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, he has exposed what the Department permits to be done during the present Administration.

Mr. TYLER. Oh, there has been no exposition at all. There is no doubt the Department has a right to do just as it has done. It has used the contingent fund, as it has authority to do whenever the occasion arises, to employ special laborers, as they are called, who are detailed for this clerical service. And they are paid a per diem, but detailed to do certain work in the yard. They are not simply clerks, but are assigned to various duties, and among them is this duty of clerical service to the labor employment board.

Mr. RYAN. Would they allow the detail of clerks for this purpose if the House disapproved of this proposition?

Mr. McALEER. Of course that would not change it.

Mr. RYAN. I think it would.

Mr. TYLER. No. As long as you have the labor employment board, which, by the way, I might state in this connection is recommended by the President of the United States—

A MEMBER. That kills it.

Mr. TYLER. As long as that board remains you will find that these details for special service have to be made.

Mr. McALEER. There is no doubt of that; it has to be done.

Mr. SAYERS. Why?

Mr. TYLER. It is done as a regulation of the Navy Department—

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Is it a Department order?

Mr. TYLER. Yes; and you can not get rid of it in this way. The only effect of a failure to adopt this provision would be to injure the clerk. It would not affect the board. If you want to assail the labor board, you should do it in some proper manner and not in this way.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask my friend from Virginia, in reference to the yard in Washington: Have removals been made there at the instance of Congressmen or not?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. What has that got to do with this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Because the labor board is involved in the bill.

Mr. TYLER. If it would be any satisfaction to the gentleman from Texas, I will say that I fully sympathize with him in his feelings with regard to this labor employment board. I have had more trouble individually than the gentleman could possibly have had to contend with in that regard.

Mr. SICKLES. Then let us kill it.

Mr. TYLER. But the trouble is you can not do it in this way.

Mr. McALEER. If you want to get rid of it you will have to proceed in some other way than that proposed here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SAYERS to strike out the provision, it was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will kindly consent that the committee rise for a few minutes, in order to dispose of a matter which is very important to be disposed of to-day. It will only take a few minutes.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I suppose there will be no objection to going on with the naval appropriation bill afterwards?

Mr. SAYERS. None whatever.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I move that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my thanks to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] for his kindness. I am instructed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to make the following conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] submits a conference report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 273) "extending from March 3, 1895, to the 15th day of April, 1895, the time for making returns of income for the year 1894," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the words "ordinary repairs" and insert "shall be deducted;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment inserting at the end of the amendment the following: "And returns or reports of the names and salaries of employees shall not be required from employers unless called for by the collector in order to verify the returns of employees;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title to said joint resolution 273, and agree to the same.

BENTON McMILLIN,

A. B. MONTGOMERY,

A. J. HOPKINS,

Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

G. G. VEST,

STEPHEN M. WHITE,

W. B. ALLISON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement of the House conferees.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

First. The effect of the action on the first amendment of the Senate is to allow the owner of real estate to deduct the amount necessarily paid for fire insurance from the income from the same when making his return. It applies only to real estate. It does not enlarge in other respects the amount of deductions that may be made. Under the income-tax law deduction might be made for necessary repairs, but not for betterments. This provision remains and is not enlarged by the amendment hereby agreed upon.

Second. The effect of the second amendment is to require corporations to return the tax list for corporate property and relieve the individual from the necessity of doing so. It is agreed to by the conferees to prevent the possibility of double taxation. Whilst the law guarded against this, it was thought not improper to add any additional assurance thereof that was necessary.

The amendment added by the conferees to the second amendment frees employers from the necessity of returning the names and salaries of their employees except when called for by the collector to verify the returns of employees. For that purpose the right will still exist.

Third. The third amendment the Senate conferees recede from. This was thought best, not only for the Government, but for the taxpayer.

BENTON McMILLIN,

A. B. MONTGOMERY,

A. J. HOPKINS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, just one word as to the effect of the legislation that is proposed here. The income-tax law that was passed during the last session of this Congress provided that the returns should be made by the 1st of March; but it will be remembered that, by reason of delays consequent upon agitation in the Senate of the question of making appropriations, the appropriation for the organization of the Bureau to arrange and send out the blanks was postponed, so there has not been the necessary time intervening between the 1st of January, the date of assessment, and the 1st of March, the day for the returns.

The Department found that a good deal of confusion was likely to result from crowding into a few days the work that was intended to be done in ninety days, and asked that the time for assessment of the tax and making the returns should be extended from March 1 to April 15.

It was also provided in the law that if the returns were not made within ninety days the penalty should attach. It is very unjust that that penalty should attach when, by reason of delays in Congress, it has been impossible for the taxpayer to make the return in the time required by law.

Now, as to the controversy between the House and the Senate, this is the situation: The first amendment offered by the Senate provided that in making his return upon real estate the taxpayer should be authorized to deduct not only the ordinary expenses of keeping the premises in repair, but the fire insurance as well. The conferees on the part of the House admit, as it will be remembered it was admitted on the floor when the discussion was up, that if the amount expended on the real estate was to keep it in its present condition, the taxpayer should deduct that money spent as repairs; so that the amendment of the Senate did not change the existing law in this respect. He might make repairs, but not betterments. The fire insurance we thought was not improper to be deducted, and the first amendment allows that to be deducted as a part of the expense when the taxpayer makes his returns on the property.

The second provision is as to employees. It will be remembered that when the income-tax bill passed the House it was the purpose to require corporations and employers to return the names of those who were engaged in their service in order that the Government might assess and collect from the employer the tax that would fall upon the employee and make its collection certain. When the bill got to the Senate they changed it in that particular, so as to put the employee on the same footing with other taxpayers and let him make his payment himself.

It will be remembered that we had to take the bill as a whole, and could not change it in conference. This left the law so that the corporation returns the names and the salaries of the employee without paying the tax; and we thought that, the necessity for the return ceasing, the requirements thereof might cease. Therefore the House conferees agreed with the Senate conferees that the return should be made by the employee and the tax paid by the employee as are the taxes of others; this right only being reserved, that in the event the collector has doubt as to the accuracy of the returns made by the employee, he may call upon the employer, as he would on any other person, to ascertain his property. That is the second amendment.

The third amendment, Mr. Speaker, was the proposition to ingraft into this section of the act by the Senate an amendment which proposed to take from the Government the right to propound interrogatories to the taxpayer with a view of ascertaining the nature, extent, and condition of his estate. To do that would take away from the official the very means of ascertaining the right and equitable tax; and, after a free and full conference, the conferees on the part of the Senate agreed that it was wise to leave in the officers of the Government the right to make reasonable interrogatories. Therefore the second amendment of the Senate was receded from by the Senate conferees.

The fourth amendment, Mr. Speaker, is merely formal, pertaining to the title, and it is not necessary to make any statement concerning it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question as to the time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I said in the beginning that the time within which the report might be made by the taxpayer is extended by this act from the 1st of March to the middle of April.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] who is near me, and then I will yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, who is the author of this income tax, whether I understand him rightly that all the inquisitorial features are left in the bill, and if it has not been amended in that respect.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman is in error thus far, Mr. Speaker. Under the law as it passed the House all corporations had to return the names and salaries of their employees; all firms employing men had to return the names and salaries of their employees. That is done away with. But the right to inquire concerning the estate to be taxed remains in the bill. The Senate recedes from the third amendment, and the House recedes from its disagreement to the first and second amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, when he framed this measure, why he imposed the tax upon the holy estate of matrimony; why he makes every woman who has $4,000 of her own and who marries pay a tax on every dollar of the $4,000, and yet her sister or sisters, who have an equal amount of $4,000, are each one absolutely exempt? I would like to ask the gentleman what justice there is in that?

Mr. MONEY. I want to ask the gentleman if that matter was in conference?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say in response to my friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that that matter was not in conference; but I would like to state—for I do not wish to avoid answering the question—that where estates are kept separate they are taxed separate. If persons see fit to keep their estates separate they will be taxed separately, but where they combine their estates there would be one exemption on the whole estate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, as I understand the gentleman, if a woman keeps the money with her husband she will pay no tax.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, I do not mean to say that. The law applies to each individual taxpayer, with the exceptions that are made in the bill. The bill speaks for itself in that respect. I wish to say, however, that the subject about which the gentleman asks is not touched by this conference report at all, and it is a matter over which the conferees have no jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question founded on a short correspondence between a constituent of mine, Mr. E. H. Avery, of Auburn, N. Y., and the Internal Revenue Department. On February 5 Mr. Avery addressed a letter to the Department, as follows:

NATIONAL BANK OF AUBURN,
Auburn, N. Y., February 5, 1895.

DEAR SIR: The regulations relative to tax on incomes require that the estimate of gains, profits, and incomes shall include:

"1. All incomes derived from interest on notes," etc.

"3. Interest received or accrued, whether paid or not, if good and collectible."

"7. All other gains, profits, and incomes derived from any source whatever," with a proviso "that in computing the income there shall not be included the amount received from a corporation as dividends if the tax has been paid by the corporation on its net profits."

Question. Is the interest earned or accrued for the years prior to 1894, but actually paid and received in 1894, to be included?

For example, interest on a bond and mortgage is payable on the 1st day of January of each year. The interest for 1893 is paid and received January 1, 1894, and the interest for 1894 has accrued December 31, 1894, but not paid, although good and collectible.

The question arises, which of these items is to be included?

Again, clause 7, above referred to, specifying "all other income from any source whatever," would seem to include dividends on corporate stock, and yet the proviso forbids them to be included if the tax has been paid by the corporation on its net profits.

Question. Must the stockholder, at his peril, ascertain whether such tax has been paid by the corporation before making his list or return, or is the fact that the corporation is liable for and may be compelled to pay the tax a sufficient reason for omitting it, or, if included, to have it deducted from the gross income listed?

Respectfully, yours,

E. H. AVERY, President.

Hon. JOSEPH S. MILLER,
Commissioner Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

That is the letter of Mr. Avery, and I call attention to the correspondence now because of the unsatisfactory nature of the answer. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, after deliberating for ten days, replies, under date of February 15, 1895, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1895.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 5th instant, relative to income-tax returns, etc., you are respectfully referred to the collector of internal revenue for your district for all information relative to said tax. If he desires instructions or a ruling upon the subject-matter of your inquiry, he shall refer the same to this office.

Respectfully, yours,

G. W. WILSON, Acting Commissioner.

EDWARD H. AVERY, Esq.,
President National Bank of Auburn, Auburn, N. Y.

Now, I ask my friend whether the bill itself, or this report, or the resolution will get rid of what seems to be the anomaly of collecting a tax upon money actually received for interest as well as upon the additional amount actually earned during the calendar year.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the last question which my friend propounds is not embraced either in the resolution adopted by the House or in any amendment thereto adopted by the Senate and submitted to the conference. Turning now to the merits of the question, which I do with some reluctance at this time, because I hate to detain the House, I may state that the object in framing the law in the language in which he finds it was to prevent the possibility of the taxpayer avoiding payment of the tax upon money that had been earned in a given year by postponing the collection to a later date. That was the origin and object of the peculiar phraseology of the law on this subject.

Mr. PAYNE. But the law did not intend to make a man pay the tax on his income twice.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was the purpose to collect for each year the income tax properly chargeable to that year; no more and no less.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, does not my friend think that he ought to withdraw this report and see whether it ought not to be amended in that particular?

Mr. McMILLIN. In reply to my friend I will say that if it were withdrawn and submitted to us again and we were to take charge of the subject that he speaks of, which is not embraced either in the original resolution or in the amendments of the Senate, our action would be wholly illegal and a point of order would lie against it.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that this letter of Mr. Avery was written in entire good faith, and it criticises a matter that has been taken charge of by this resolution. The law originally seemed to contemplate that the individual should pay his tax upon his income unless it had been paid by a corporation, while the provision is that the corporation should not pay until months after the return has to be made.

Mr. McMILLIN. The conferees have no jurisdiction whatever, except as to disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The conference, however, has agreed to a provision, as I stated before, by which the corporation makes its return, the individual his, and there can not be two taxes imposed on the same property.

Mr. PAYNE. I know that; but I suggest to my friend that he take this matter into prayerful consideration, and see if he can not work out some good result as to a remedy for this incongruity.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will get my friend from New York to join me in these devotions, and I have no doubt that we shall attain to some good results. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; and to that end I will ask that the correspondence which I have read in part may be printed in full in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

[The letters are printed in full ante.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution:

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the joint resolution (H. Res. 209) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver condemned cannon to Asher Gaylord Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Plymouth, Pa., and to Eckley B. Cox Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Freeland, Pa.," the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to enroll the title thereof so as to read as follows: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver condemned cannon to Asher Gaylord Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Plymouth, Pa., to the William H. Tarbee Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of McGrawville, N. Y., to the Eckley B. Cox Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Freeland, Pa., and to the R. Carpenter Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Chelsea, Mich."

The SPEAKER. The Senate and House of Representatives passed this bill with amendments, but omitted to change the title in accordance with the amendments. This resolution proposes simply to authorize the enrolling clerk to amend the title as stated in the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to apply the sum of $8,000, appropriated under the act of July 26, 1894, for the repair of the ship Constitution, now lying at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, in the State of New Hampshire, in order that it may be used as a training ship for the Naval Militia, toward the repair and transfer of said vessel to the Washington Navy-Yard, District of Columbia.

Mr. EVERETT. On this paragraph I make the point of order that it is new legislation and does not reduce expenses. The last naval appropriation act appropriated money for the repair of the ship Constitution in order that it might be used specifically as a training ship for the Naval Militia. This paragraph proposes to depart from the purpose of the last act in this respect, and to divert the appropriation from the object then determined upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Steam machinery (special): To continue work on new machinery to replace present engines, boilers, etc., of United States steamship Chicago, $300,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, we have presented here the extraordinary spectacle of being asked to appropriate $300,000 for the repair of the Chicago. Now, if I remember correctly, this vessel was completed in 1885 or 1886. I may be mistaken as to the exact date, but such is my recollection. Two hundred thousand dollars was appropriated to be used for this purpose during the present fiscal year. The bill appropriates $300,000 more to be used for the same purpose next year. This is the way the money goes! Now, this ship has not been completed nine years—

Mr. SNODGRASS. It cost half a million dollars originally.

Mr. SAYERS. More than a million dollars. Now, as I have said, $200,000 was appropriated for the repair of this ship during the present year, and an appropriation of $300,000 is proposed in this bill for the same purpose next year. And yet we are asked to build more ships.

I would like the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] to inform the House, if he can, how much has been expended upon this vessel since her completion. She was completed, I believe, in 1885 or 1886.

Mr. COX. What did the vessel cost in the first place?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know what was the exact cost. This is one of those Roach ships which the Government had to take back. Will the gentleman from Maryland inform us when this ship was completed, and how much she has cost in the way of repairs up to this time—

Mr. SNODGRASS. And how much it cost originally to build her?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We appropriated $300,000 last year for the hull—

Mr. SAYERS. For the hull! Did she not have any hull? [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Oh, yes; it was because there was a hull that we wanted to repair it. If there had been no hull there would have been no occasion for repairs.

Mr. SAYERS. How much has been expended on her up to the present year?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now they are going to repair the engines and boilers. The life of the boilers of one of these vessels is estimated to be about nine years, and that of the machinery from ten to fifteen years.

Mr. MONEY. Twenty-five years.

Mr. SAYERS. One gentleman says twenty-five years; another says ten or fifteen. Whom are we to believe?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I said the life of the boilers was estimated to be about nine years.

Mr. COX. How much did the vessel cost?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. From thirteen hundred thousand to fourteen hundred thousand dollars. I think that is the amount; I will not be sure.

Mr. COX. And now you are going to repair this vessel again!

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We appropriated last year money to repair the hull, and now we are appropriating for the repair of the machinery, so that we shall have practically a new vessel.

Mr. SAYERS. A new vessel every nine years!

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I say that when the repairs are completed this will be practically a new vessel. The modern machinery will, according to the department of Steam Engineering, increase the speed of the vessel, so that in this respect it will be a better vessel than it was originally. We are within the estimate of the Department on this matter; and I hope the committee will sustain the provision of the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chicago was the first of the large steel cruisers designed for the new Navy.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I would like to state for the information of the committee that we are only appropriating now for the repairs of vessels about 1½ per cent—I am not quite accurate, but certainly less than 2 per cent—of the total value of all the vessels. We appropriate no more now than when the value of the entire Navy was $18,000,000, although it is $65,000,000 to-day. We have been as economical in the appropriations as possible, notwithstanding the criticisms of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say for the information of the committee that when the work of evolution from the wooden to the steel navy was first essayed the problem presented was a very different one from that which confronts us at this time. The Chicago was the first of the large cruisers built of steel in this country. Her designs were made by a board of naval officers, who gave much care and study to the questions involved, and undoubtedly at the time she was designed this vessel represented as great an advance in naval construction as any vessel that has ever been laid down.

She is a splendid ship. In many respects she has no superior of her class in our own or in any other navy. But it happened at the time we began designing steel ships that we had not yet reached what has since proved to be a practically revolutionary epoch in steam engineering. In designing the engines of the Chicago, an effort was made to obtain as great speed as could be had with the machinery then familiar to our naval engineers. But the problem of getting the greatest speed with the lightest weight and the smallest space had not reached the solution which came later on, in what is known to steam engineers as the triple-expansion system. Every one familiar with this subject is aware of the marvelous possibilities at once created by the application of this triple-expansion system. And it so happens that while the Chicago, as I have said, is in many respects one of the very finest ships built of her class, or of any build of any country, yet her machinery is not so powerful nor is her speed so great as that of other vessels of her class which have been built since the triple or quadruple expansion system was introduced in naval construction.

The problem for the Navy Department and for all persons interested in the development of the Navy was whether we should go on allowing this magnificent vessel to lack in the prime element of speed, utilize it as far as possible as it is, and build an additional new cruiser to take her place among the fast vessels of the navies of the world, or whether it was better, where she has reached an age that certain improvements or repairs have become absolutely essential, to take out altogether her boilers and engines, supply the ship with first-class triple or quadruple expansion engines, and make her one of the finest cruisers of her weight in the world.

By putting new boilers and new engines into this vessel we can at once add to the American Navy as fine a ship as we could build at this time if we were to lay down the keel now and start from the very beginning. It is a matter of economy, therefore, and it seems to me it ought to be a matter of national pride as well, to make this steel cruiser, as she can readily be made, one of the finest vessels of her type afloat.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand my friend from Maine aright, he furnishes a substantial reason why we should not undertake at this time to build the three new battle ships provided for in this bill. Here, for instance, is the Chicago, which is not, I think, exceeding nine years old, if even so old as that, and he says that in order to furnish her with modern improvements—

Mr. DURBOROW. To make her worthy of the name. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. We must spend $300,000.

Mr. SIMPSON. That will make her "worthy of the name," spending that much money.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, we expended $200,000 on her this fiscal year, and we have a proposition to expend $300,000 additional for the next fiscal year.

I hold in my hand a list of the amounts expended for the repairs of vessels. Take, for instance, the cruiser Boston, completed about the same time as the Chicago, and we find that we have spent $188,000, in round numbers, upon her repairs. The Baltimore, completed not long since, has incurred an expenditure of over $151,000. The San Francisco, a ship of late date, has also incurred an expenditure of over $135,000 in the way of repairs. Do you not think it a very expensive Navy? You can not get public buildings in the interior, but you can build fine quarters and magnificent ships for which you have no need.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Are you for public buildings?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; because the extravagance of this bill denies to the interior of the country the appropriations which it ought to have.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman would not advocate going without stockings because it takes too much yarn to darn them, would he? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask leave to print in the RECORD this statement, showing the expenditure in the matter of repairs on the new vessels:

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman also state, in connection with that list, that 95 per cent of those so-called repairs are for painting, scraping of bottoms, etc., and not legitimate repairs, but simply current expenses of maintenance? That ought to go in with your statement.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Texas are exactly in line with all that he has said upon this bill, and they prove conclusively that he does not want a navy at all. He is against the building of ships, he is against dockyards, and he is against repairing ships.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, I advocated the building of ships while you were practicing law here in Washington.

Mr. MONEY. You have not done it to-day or since this bill was under consideration, and you have had a great change of heart since the time when you did advocate a navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He does not want to build any new ships; he does not want to repair those in existence, and those which are afloat he does not want to put any sailors upon.

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly the matter, and I want to say to my friend that in 1811, a year before the war with Great Britain, a gentleman from the South stood here and did exactly what the gentleman from Texas is doing. He said he would not vote a dollar to build an American navy, and he said he would rather set fire to a ship than to bring a bucket of water to put it out; yet the very next year we were engaged in a war with Great Britain, and we were absolutely defenseless, because the House had followed the counsels of such statesmen as the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. We licked them, anyhow.

Mr. MONEY. In 1857, 1858, and 1859 the very same arguments were made against having a navy—that it was useless, that the people did not want ships built, or dockyards, or repairs, or men to furnish them. Yet the next year saw the country plunged in a war that convulsed the continent.

Mr. SNODGRASS. We whipped England once without ships. Why can we not do it again if necessary?

Mr. MONEY. We ought at least to have a Navy that will give this great Republic time to organize her Army. As it is to-day, we could not bring out the militia of this country even to meet the onset of a British squadron. Gentlemen feel perfectly secure to-day because we are at peace, but there is nothing so inevitable as war, and we want to be in a condition to-day to command the peace which we love. I understand the value of peace as well as the gentleman does. I appreciate its blessings. I cry "Peace, peace," just as the gentleman from Texas does, but the way to get peace is not to be in a state of unreadiness for war. Do you want this country struck down and left defenseless in the hands of its enemies?

Mr. SAYERS. Naked before her enemies!

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly what is the matter. Every proposition that the distinguished economist, the gentleman from Texas, has advocated in reference to this bill has been to the effect that we do not want any Navy, and ought not to have one. He is against every proposition to build a ship, to repair a ship, to put an engine in a ship, to build a dockyard, or anything else that goes to the maintenance of the Navy. And while it is a great thing to have the reputation for economy that the distinguished gentleman from Texas enjoys in this country, I submit to him that when he reviews this debate he will find that he has not manifested the patriotic disposition which we look for from a leader upon the floor of this House.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I will say only a word. I voted for the rebuilding of the Navy while the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] was practicing law here in Washington.

Mr. MONEY. It does not make any difference what I was doing.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is like all new converts, extremely zealous. Now, all that I desire is to call the attention of the committee to the sore spots in this bill, and gentlemen become irritated when I do that and accuse me of a want of patriotism and of hostility to the Navy. I have about as much patriotism as either of these gentlemen.

Mr. MONEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Prove it by voting for the Navy. Prove your patriotism by your vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland must be in order.

Mr. SAYERS. Patriotism does not require that we should vote $300,000 here in addition to the $200,000 which this ship had for the present year in order to give it modern improvements. This makes $500,000.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in reply to my friend from Texas. The gentleman is mistaken if he thinks anybody is irritated. We are all in perfectly good humor, and if anybody is irritated it is the gentleman; but nobody is irritated. It is certainly no argument, because we want to utilize a valuable ship which certainly ought to be used, for him to say that he had voted for the Navy when I was practicing law and when the gentleman was practicing demagoguery. [Laughter.]

I say that I voted in favor of the Navy before the gentleman ever dreamed of being here. Twenty years ago I voted for ships, and I have voted that way ever since. I stand here to-day committed as much as any man can be to a policy to make this great nation prepared to command peace and to resist any other navy on earth. [Applause.] As to my patriotism, I do not propose to test that with the gentleman from Texas. I am willing to accord him patriotism and honesty in the views which he expresses, but the gentleman is not more so than other men in the House. I do not think anybody has said anything but in the way of kindness in this debate.

Mr. SAYERS. Nothing whatever. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To commence new machinery to replace present engines and boilers of United States steamship Hartford, $100,000.

Mr. SAYERS. I will call the attention of the committee to this item. Here is $100,000 more to be appropriated to put new boilers and engines in the Hartford. What is to be done with this vessel?

Mr. TYLER. Fight her.

Mr. SAYERS. I am perfectly willing to take care of the vessel on account of the memories which are associated with her name.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Then give the money to take care of her.

Mr. SAYERS. Why, gentlemen at one time say they must have modern steel cruisers and battle ships. Now, the Hartford is not a modern steel cruiser or battle ship. Take care of the Hartford if you wish; I have no objection to that, but what for?

Mr. TYLER. To make her serviceable.

Mr. SAYERS. Make her serviceable! How long would she stand before an English cruiser?

Mr. TYLER. We want the three battle ships to do that.

Mr. SAYERS. Take care of her; but do not put such fine machinery into an old vessel like the Hartford.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Why, the gentleman permitted the last appropriation bill to go through without a single word of objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Hartford is not to be stationed at Washington. The purpose is to put the Hartford in commission as a cruiser and send her wherever the American flag shall fly.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy shall have power to convene general courts-martial for the trial of naval cadets, subject to the same limitations and conditions now existing as to other general courts-martial, and to approve the proceedings and execute the sentences of such courts, except the sentences of suspension and dismissal, which, after having been approved by the Superintendent, shall not be carried into effect until confirmed by the President: Provided, That, when the Superintendent is the accuser or prosecutor the court shall be convened by order of the President.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make the point of order on that paragraph. It is new legislation, commencing at line 13, on page 35.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the committee on that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kansas is under some misapprehension. I will state very briefly that this paragraph refers to the Naval Academy. That paragraph was drawn by the Navy Department, after consultation with myself and others, as a result of a surprising discovery which some of us made a short time ago. Members who thought they were somewhat familiar with the affairs of the Naval Academy find there is a difference between that institution and the Military Academy on account of the way our laws have grown up regarding these different bodies, one statute being passed to-day and another to-morrow. We found that really there is no provision whatever for the determination of any charges at the Naval Academy against the cadets.

Mr. SICKLES. It is like the board of labor employment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is no such provision as is made for the Military Academy. It is not only possible, but it has transpired, that actually charges have been made against some of these young men and determined simply upon an investigation by a summary board, composed of just such men as they shall see fit to choose—two or three officers, who take just such means as they shall see fit to ascertain the facts, without taking testimony or any record of testimony, and without any opportunity for the cadet to be present either in person or by counsel, without any opportunity for cross-examination of the witnesses, without any of the safeguards that are thrown by the regulations of the Navy around the humblest defendant in any case, but by a summary court-martial.

This condition of things was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy by a case in which I had become interested a short while ago, and the result was the drawing up of this provision, which is intended to give to cadets at the Naval Academy, in case of charges being preferred against them, the same methods of having those charges investigated that are employed at the Military Academy or that would be adopted in any court of justice. It is precisely the same provision that is now on the statute book in regard to the Academy at West Point; indeed, it was drawn from that provision. The whole purport and object of it is to throw around the 200 or 300 young men at the Naval Academy the ordinary safeguards of justice which by law and the regulations of the Navy are granted to the humblest sailor or coal heaver in the service.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is really in the direction of reducing expenses, because now, whenever they have any trouble at the Academy, the Secretary of the Navy brings up everybody that he wants to examine—

Mr. SAYERS. Only one single time.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Whether it is one single time or a hundred times, it makes no difference as to the principle.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand exactly what this might lead to, and it struck me on reading it as aiming at a further concentration of power in the hands of the Executive, where I think there is too much already. With the explanation which has been given by the gentleman from Maine I am satisfied that this provision is for the betterment of the Navy, and I therefore withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 14, lines 20 and 21: "Naval station, Sacketts Harbor, N. Y.: For one ship keeper, at $366 per annum."

I am advised by the Department that there is an old vessel at Sacketts Harbor which is not worth very much, but the man who has charge of her has also charge of the Government property and stores at that point. He is now and always has been designated as "ship keeper," but in connection with the duty of taking care of the vessel he is also charged with the care of the other Government property there, and he is employed at a cost of $1 a day.

Mr. SIMPSON. Has the gentleman any knowledge of what the Government property consists?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I have no detailed knowledge, but it certainly must be worth something, as Sacketts Harbor is a naval station, and might, in certain contingencies, be a very important one.

The report of the Navy-Yard Commission submitted to the Forty-eighth Congress (Sen. Ex. Doc. No. 55) says:

The great importance of the naval operations on the lakes during the war of 1812, the exposed condition of that portion of our frontier, and the enormous amount of property on those waters belonging to our citizens and therefore liable to destruction in the event of war, admonish your commissioners not to recommend the abandonment of the only naval station—whatever its demerits—we now hold in that quarter.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, upon the gentleman's explanation, if I can have the consent of the House, I will withdraw the amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now, Mr. Chairman, the totals as they stand in some of the paragraphs of the bill have been varied by the action of the committee, and I ask that the Clerk foot them up so that they may be correct. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8665) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Senate bill 2365, which has been referred to Committee on Claims, ought to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and without objection it will be so referred.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHERMERHORN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of W. A. Yates, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CORRECTION.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, on page 2859 of the RECORD I am recorded as having voted in the affirmative on the proposition to suspend the rules and pass the bill to authorize the Altamonte Water Company to flood certain lands, etc. I desire to say that I was detained at home by sickness yesterday, and of course did not vote.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION AT NASHVILLE.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to file the views of the minority, to be printed with the report on the bill (H. R. 8109) to encourage the holding of a centennial exposition at Nashville, Tenn.

The House then, on motion of Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.), adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year ending December 31, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

SENATOR FROM MONTANA.

Mr. POWER. I present the credentials of Hon. Thomas Henry Carter, chosen by the legislature of Montana a Senator from that State for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th of March next, which I ask may be read.

The credentials were read, as follows:

In the name and by the authority of the Congress of the United States and the State of Montana.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, John E. Rickards, governor of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that at a joint session of the legislative assembly of the State of Montana, held at the capital thereof on Wednesday, the 16th day of January, A. D. 1895, pursuant to chapter I, Title II, Revised Statutes of the United States, Hon. Thomas Henry Carter, a resident of Montana, received a majority of the votes in each house for Senator of the United States from Montana.

Therefore, by virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution and in pursuance of the laws of the United States, I do hereby commission him, the said Thomas Henry Carter, as United States Senator to represent the State of Montana in Congress, hereby authorizing and empowering him to execute and discharge all and singular the duties appertaining to a Senator in Congress and to enjoy all the privileges and immunities in accordance with the laws thereof for a period of six years from the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused the great seal of the State of Montana to be affixed at Helena, Mont., the capital of said State, the 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1895, and in the one hundred and nineteenth year of the independence of the United States of America.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

J. E. RICKARDS.
L. ROTWITT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to say a word about the credentials which have just been presented. I do not like, especially in the present condition of the public business, to trouble the Senate with small or unimportant criticisms, but credentials which authorize a Senator's name to be put upon the roll are of very great importance indeed, because there may at some time be a severe or angry political struggle between two equally balanced parties, and it is important, as it seems to me, that the State executives should get into the habit of following the simple precedent which has been set and followed now in so many cases.

A simple declaration certified by the executive of the State that on a certain day a certain person was duly elected by the legislature a Senator seems to me, and I am sure seems to the Senate, to be all that is needed. Anything beyond that is likely to suggest questions and refinements. These credentials do not set forth the fact of the due election; they do set forth the fact that the person voted for had a majority of the votes in each house, and that probably would be deemed, certainly in the absence of any real dispute of the facts, an equivalent, but, of course, it is not an equivalent.

Then the credentials go on to say, what is a matter for the governor's own satisfaction or otherwise, that he commissioned the Senator. I suppose the governor of the State has no more authority to commission a Senator of the United States than he has to commission the Sultan of Turkey.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say that I believe when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, by the unanimous agreement of that committee a form of credentials was agreed upon and prepared some years ago, to be followed by the governors of the States in certifying the elections of Senators. I suggest to the Senator that a number of those forms should be printed so as to be easily accessible to the governors of the various States.

Mr. HOAR. I think that would be a very good plan.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on the files of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a memorial of the legislature of the State of Washington, certified by the secretary of state, representing that it is very important that in the next river and harbor appropriation bill there shall be an appropriation for the improvement of the Skagit River, the largest river emptying into Puget Sound, and which drains one of the most important sections of the State of Washington.

This river is blocked by jams of timber carried down by floods, which, besides impeding navigation, cause it in times of high water to back up and overflow the surrounding country, the richest and most fertile section in the State of Washington, producing widespread desolation and ruin. Besides these jams there are also several sand bars near the mouth of the river, which are a serious hindrance to commerce and navigation, and also in time of flood tend to cause the water to back up and overflow the adjacent land.

The farmers of the extensive region known as the Skagit Valley have been put to great expense in building dikes and levees, and have found that they can not, in that manner, protect their land from overflow until the jams and bars are removed.

It is represented that the inundation of the Skagit Valley in the year 1894 resulted in a loss of at least half a million dollars to the inhabitants, and that the inundation was in a great measure caused by these jams and sand bars.

It is also represented that these jams and sand bars are increasing in size each year, thereby threatening impending ruin to a large tract of the country and pointing out the necessity of speedy action to avert this disaster. I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. A few days since I presented a petition of the Cherokee Indian Association of the Cherokee Nation, an association representing what are called the intruders in the Cherokee Nation. I presented the petition by request. I now present a reply made by the delegates of the Cherokee Nation in the nature of a petition, praying Congress to designate the Court of Claims or some other important tribunal to pass upon and settle the controversy between the Cherokee Nation and the members of that association. I also present this petition by request. I move that it be referred, as the other petition was referred, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER presented a petition of 130 citizens of Lawrence, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting unnaturalized persons from voting; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of 38 citizens of Luthersburg, of 295 citizens of Lykens, of 40 citizens of Ryde, of 275 citizens of West Chester, of 419 citizens of Callensburg, of 150 citizens of Coal Valley, of 330 citizens of McKeesport, of 75 citizens of Beringer, of 115 citizens of Brookville, of 80 citizens of Reynoldsville, and of 125 citizens of Tower City, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the appropriation of moneys for sectarian institutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of 235 citizens of Lykens, of 38 citizens of Luthersburg, of 275 citizens of West Chester, of 350 citizens of McKeesport, of 80 citizens of Reynoldsville, of 75 citizens of Beringer, of 60 citizens of Tippecanoe, of 115 citizens of Brookville, of 125 citizens of Tower City, and of 419 citizens of Callensburg, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that "no State shall grant the right of franchise to any person who is not a citizen of the United States;" which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL presented resolutions of the general assembly of the State of Missouri, favoring the foreclosure of the Government's mortgage on the Union Pacific Railroad, and for the Government ownership and operation of said road; which were referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Commercial Club of Kansas City, Mo., favoring the ratification of the treaties with the Wichita, Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of 60 citizens of St. Louis, Mo., and a petition of 181 citizens of Warrensburg, Mo., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the appropriation of moneys for sectarian institutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of 181 citizens of Warrensburg, Mo., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that "no State shall grant the right of franchise to any person who is not a citizen of the United States;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 29th ultimo, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2748) to authorize the Wisconsin and New Duluth Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8767) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by Mr. CAMERON on the 4th instant, intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill, to report it favorably. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CAMERON to the bill (H. R. 8665) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

"That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to credit Philip S. Wales, medical director, United States Navy, with the sum of $44,055.89, to relieve the said Wales from certain charges raised against him on the books of the Treasury upon Treasury settlement numbered 8002, dated January 10, 1895: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be satisfied that the said Philip S. Wales received no benefit from the payment of the vouchers represented in the charges now standing against him in said Treasury settlement numbered 8002."

Mr. KYLE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by himself on the 24th ultimo, intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2778) to aid and encourage the holding of the Tennessee Centennial Exposition at Nashville, Tenn., in the year 1896, and making appropriation therefor, reported it without amendment.

INDEX TO COTTON REPORT.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to employ a competent person to make an index to volumes 1 and 2 of the report of said committee on cotton, and the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was to add at the end of the resolution the words "not exceeding two hundred dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia what are these volumes and what is proposed to be done by this person?

Mr. GEORGE. What is the question of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to know what the volumes are that the Agricultural Committee want to have edited?

Mr. GEORGE. They are two volumes of testimony, reports of consuls, and statistics furnishing very valuable information in relation to cotton.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CLAIM OF JULIA A. NUTT.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 440) to carry out certain findings of the Quartermaster-General and the Court of Claims, reported the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the claim of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, late of Natchez, Miss., now pending before Congress, under the provisions of the act of August 7, 1882 (22 Stat., p. 736), for the relief of said claimant, be, and the same hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims for reinvestigation and refunding of facts and report to Congress under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if this case has been once investigated by the Court of Claims?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; but there is question about some evidence.

Mr. HARRIS. There is newly discovered testimony?

Mr. STEWART. There is some further testimony, and the court expressed some doubt.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but I desire to say that there are a very large number of claims which have been referred to that court and have been investigated and reported by the court. They have been hung up here for two years, and so far as I can learn they are not being considered. But even when committees are conferred with about them they seem to deem it necessary to go through every item of the claim or case with a view of reinvestigation. It seems to me that unless the findings of that court carry with them some weight to the Congress of the United States the whole theory of referring claims to it ought to be abandoned and perhaps the court abolished. I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. This is rather a special case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORDON introduced a bill (S. 2784) for the erection of a custom-house and post-office building at Brunswick, Ga.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2785) for the relief of John E. Welch, a citizen of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 137) for the completion of the survey in Plymouth Harbor, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 139) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver unserviceable or condemned cannon to the mayor of Burlington, Vt., to be used in decorating Battery Park; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on Forest Reservations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUAY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KYLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on Forest Reservations.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR COLQUITT.

Mr. GORDON. I offer a concurrent resolution in reference to the printing of eulogies, which I ask may be considered at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. Alfred Holt Colquitt, late a Senator from the State of Georgia, be printed, as required by law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GORDON. I think there will be no objection to the resolution. It is simply the usual order to print eulogies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule, the Chair will state to the Senator.

Mr. GORDON. Very well.

PRINTING OF SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 300 additional copies of House bill No. 8518, an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, as reported to the Senate February 18, 1895.

INTRODUCTION OF REINDEER INTO ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit a copy of the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, with maps and illustrations, upon the work of introducing reindeer into Alaska during the season of 1894.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CALL, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate meet at the hour of 11 in the morning and remain in session until 5 p. m., then take a recess until the hour of 8 p. m.

Mr. CALL. The resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. CALL. If the morning business is over—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not concluded. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] coming over from a previous day. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. WOLCOTT were read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the welfare and prosperity of the United States require the enactment of a law for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Resolved, That in view of the fact that this Congress will expire by law on March 4, and that there are important appropriation bills requiring the attention of the Senate, it is the sense of the Senate that consideration of such a law be not entered upon at this session of Congress.

Mr. HIGGINS obtained the floor.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Delaware will yield to me a moment, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8681) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. The bill has passed the House of Representatives. It is a matter about which the people interested are very much concerned, and it will only take the time to read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Delaware will kindly yield, I ask for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CALL. I wish to make an observation. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8479) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. CALL. I will give way to the Senator from Arkansas as soon as the appropriation bill is taken up.

Mr. BUTLER. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS] has the floor, and has yielded.

Mr. HIGGINS. I am entitled to the floor and yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Arkansas. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8631) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President—

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HIGGINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian service during the coming fiscal year may be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BUTLER. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. CALL. Then I give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware I shall move to take the bill up.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I desire to say that the friends of the regular order, the pending silver bill, have no disposition to incur the risk of an extra session, and we so stated at the beginning. Developments have shown that while the friends of the measure have a majority in this body, it is impossible to pass the bill at the present late day of the session without incurring very grave danger to the appropriation bills and an extra session. Under these circumstances the friends of the silver measure have authorized me to say that it will not be further pressed at this session of Congress.

INCOME RETURNS FOR 1894.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to enter a motion at this time to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the report of the committee of conference submitted yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] on the joint resolution (H. Res. 273) extending from March 1, 1895, to April 15, 1895, the time for making returns of income for the year 1894. I simply desire to enter the motion at this time, and later in the day I shall endeavor to call it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. VEST. Permit me to say, Mr. President, that that motion in the interests of the people of this country ought to be determined at once. By our action yesterday we notified the public at large, or every taxpayer at least, under the income-tax law, that this matter had been settled, and now, when under the provisions of the amendment we adopted the time is extended to the 15th of April and the taxpayers are preparing their returns daily, to reopen it and leave it all undecided is not right and not just to the taxpayers of the country. The matter ought to be determined now.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well, Mr. President. I did not want to take the Senator from Delaware off the floor for more than a moment. We will determine it, so far as I am concerned, at any moment.

Mr. HIGGINS. I trust the question will not come up now. It can come up after my remarks have been finished.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Delaware indulge me for a single moment?

Mr. HIGGINS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that on to-morrow evening, at such an hour as the Senate may see proper, it take a recess, agreeing to meet again at 8 o'clock to-morrow night, for the purpose of considering Order of Business 573.

Mr. PLATT. What measure is that?

Mr. HARRIS. The sewer and street extension bill in the District of Columbia. I simply desire to say that the sanitary condition and health of this city, as well as very large pecuniary interests of the people of this city, are involved, and it is vitally important that that bill shall be considered and acted upon in whatever manner the Senate proposes to act upon it at the earliest day possible. I ask unanimous consent for a meeting to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock for the consideration of that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALLEN, Mr. McLaurin, and Mr. Pettigrew. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: I offer a resolution, which I ask may be printed and lie over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a night session be held by the Senate, beginning at 8 o'clock on Friday evening, the 22d instant, to consider Senate bill No. 2066, being "A bill to provide for continuing the system of trunk sewers in the District of Columbia, to provide for sewage disposal, to lay out highways, and for other purposes."

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion? I see the Senator asks for a session Friday evening to consider a bill of which I heartily approve. I call his attention to the fact, however, that that is the evening of the 22d of February, and there are social and other engagements that evening.

Mr. Aldrich. Make it next week some time.

Mr. HAWLEY. So far as I am concerned, any evening will be satisfactory.

Mr. HARRIS. Might it not be well to have it to-morrow evening? The resolution goes over, and I shall ask the Senate to consider it to-morrow morning. I will change the time from Friday evening, the 22d, to Thursday evening, the 21st.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made. The resolution goes over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HIGGINS. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 8499.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 8499) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in the county of Dakota, in the State of Nebraska, and in the city of Sioux City, in the county of Woodbury, in the State of Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FRYE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

YELLOWSTONE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. POWER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6750) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River in the county of Dawson, State of Montana. I will state that a Senate bill in the same terms has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce; I therefore ask for action upon the House bill, and if it shall be passed I shall move the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ALLEN. I think the bridge bills ought to be considered together. I therefore object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

ADOPTION OF CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to me that I may ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which it is important should be passed. I think it will take but a moment.

Mr. HIGGINS. What is the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the bill to authorize the adoption of children in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HIGGINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5711) to authorize the adoption of children in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Several SENATORS. Regular order!

COINAGE OF SILVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] are before the Senate, upon which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, we have a sudden change of scene between last night and this morning as to the status of the silver question in the Senate. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] offered late last evening his resolutions, which are now the pending order, while this morning the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] has almost cut the ground from under our feet, by stating that his bill, once so urgent and so necessitous, will not now be pressed to a vote.

I should not feel relieved, Mr. President, of any reason for taking up the time of the Senate were the difference between the resolutions of the Senator from Colorado and the bill of the Senator from Arkansas a vital difference. Instead of that there is a vital concurrence between them. Both are declarations of policy on this momentous question to be met by this body. Of course, the bill of the Senator from Arkansas was neither presented nor urged as legislation, let alone serious legislation. He knows, as we all know, that at this stage of the session it is impossible for such a measure to receive the legislative assent. He knows, as we all know, that in all human probability, if it passed this body, it could not be passed by the other branch of Congress, still less that it could receive the sanction of the Executive. It amounts, therefore, to no more than a declaration of policy, and that is just what the first resolution of the Senator from Colorado is. The resolution is as follows:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the welfare and prosperity of the United States require the enactment of a law for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

We may well ask, Mr. President, why we are to be vexed with this question at this stage of the public business and of the session? What good is to be accomplished by it? On the other hand, what harm, what vast injury, may be accomplished by it if it be adopted.

I shall not take up the time or weary the patience of the Senate by any rehash of the discussion of the silver question so elaborately considered in the first session of the present Congress, not to say in preceding sessions, but it does become incumbent on us to understand just where this question now stands.

I was surprised at the attitude of the Senator from Arkansas, finding fault or complaining that any discussion should be indulged in by the opponents of his bill or the opponents of this policy; surprised, in the first place, because his bill, it not being serious legislation, was itself but Senatorial discussion, playing for position, possibly a stump speech, not a bill presented with a view to its passage. If, therefore, the Senate is asked to vote on that question and thus make such a declaration, surely it is incumbent upon individual members of the Senate not to let such an utterance of this body go out to the country or to the world without some statement on their part of their belief and of their opinions.

A long time, Mr. President, has elapsed since the repeal of the silver clause of the Sherman Act; a year and nearly four months in time, but a period so pregnant with events, so full of experience on this question, that we have learned to know more about it than we should in any ten years of the previous experience of the world in this regard. During all this time there has been no discussion in this body of the silver question. Now we are asked suddenly to make this declaration, and to remain dumb as to all that has occurred meanwhile.

The passage of the silver purchase repeal act marked the broad lines of difference of treatment of this subject by the two sides of the Chamber. Those on the side I speak for professed to believe—I know I believe, and I think all the others believe—that they are true supporters of the doctrine and the principle of bimetalism. I say that despite the sneers of our friends on the other side of the question, who seem to insist upon it that we are but gold monometallists. On the contrary, our position is made very clear by an example that what we contend for, what our policy is pointed at, is nothing else but the restoration of the state of affairs as it existed before Germany suspended the coinage of silver in 1870 or 1871, and before her action was followed by France and the rest of Europe, and acceded to by the United States when we came to coinage.

Up to that time there had been no silver problem; the world had not been troubled by it. Everywhere, since France had adopted her standard of 15½ to 1 in 1803, silver had been freely coined in all of the mints, except that of England, at that ratio, and the two metals had subsisted as standard money side by side in all the marts of the world. All we ask is that a policy be pursued by the United States which will tend and lead to that result. That is the bimetalism in which we believe. We are not gold monometallists, and we are opposed to, and shall oppose to the very last, silver monometallism.

The two sides took issue on this matter in the fight over the repeal of the silver-purchase act, and, as we all know, it resulted in the repeal. That was a step momentous in its character, vast in its results, and, as I have said, has been followed by a larger chapter and measure of experience in the year and a quarter which has elapsed since then than in any period of five times its length before in the history of the world.

The measure was, of course, one of experiment. Every such attempt by man in respect to this silver problem since Germany began the process of demonetization has been but one of experiment. It always remains in the experimental stage. Since 1878 we have been coining silver under the Bland-Allison Act until we had accumulated a stock of silver which was very large and quite as much as was presently needed for our purposes. Pressed by the advocates of free and unlimited coinage of silver, in 1890 we passed the purchase act, and under that act this country became the purchaser of 54,000,000 ounces of silver every year, issuing Treasury notes in substitution thereof based upon the bullion in the Treasury, and adding that to our paper money requiring to be redeemed.

A condition of things arose which alarmed the world and alarmed the people of this country. We were called upon to take a new departure. A new departure we did take. We initiated then a great measure of policy on this important subject. The real object, the raison d'être of the repeal act, was to serve notice upon Europe that the United States would no longer be the patient ass carrying the silver burden of the world; that they might not expect or hope or look for the mitigation of the exigencies of the silver problem by reason of the United States carrying upon its broad shoulders the whole of this burden. That we had essayed in a tentative way under the Bland-Allison Act, that we assumed with light heart and gay step when we enacted the purchase act. Silver went up to $1.29 an ounce under the assurances of my friend, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and then went back until it came to not more than 80 cents per ounce. The silver problem in all its dreadful features remained to perplex and vex and injure mankind. Should we go on to perpetuate it or should we seek to end it, and how should it be ended?

There is no question or difference between the two sides of this Chamber on this subject as to the disease; our diagnosis was the same. The broad difference was as to what the remedy should be. Our friends, the supporters of the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the United States alone, said that that was the remedy. Some of them are the open advocates of silver monometallism, and say that that will be good for the United States and the world; others that the United States by such free coinage will bring silver to a parity with gold at a ratio of 16 to 1 and at a price of $1.29 per ounce of silver. On the other hand, unwilling to take the risk of such a step, the Senate and the House of Representatives and the President in that great act took the important step which is now attacked by this resolution. We enacted as the policy of this Government, as I said before, that we will no longer play the part of the patient ass carrying the burdens of all the world. We served notice upon Great Britain, upon Germany, upon France, upon all Europe, that they would have to bear and suffer along with us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware will suspend. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2642) providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the unfinished business be laid aside informally to allow the Senator from Delaware to conclude his remarks.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I must appeal to the Senator from Delaware, as well as the Senator from Arkansas, to cease the discussion at this time. All the great appropriation bills are pending in the Senate or in the committee, and it will be almost impossible to have fair consideration of those bills unless we begin with them now. I must appeal to the Senator in the public interest to give way and permit me to make a motion now, as I was requested to do by the Senator in charge of the Indian appropriation bill, that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. HIGGINS. I shall feel compelled to make my remarks on some other order of business. I never have taken up much time of the Senate in the discussion of any question.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator from Delaware ought to proceed.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask who has the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that when the hour of 12 o'clock arrived the unfinished business was laid before the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], in charge of that bill, asked unanimous consent that it be laid aside for the present.

Mr. HIGGINS. I object.
Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Arkansas repeat his request?
Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My suggestion was that the coinage bill be informally laid aside. I stated a few moments ago in the Senate that in view of the lateness of the session and the necessity for passing the appropriation bills, the friends of the measure having had it before the Senate and having developed the fact that they were in the majority, and the minority presenting a determined opposition to it, it was impossible for us without danger to the appropriation bills to undertake to pass the bill at the present session, and that under those circumstances the friends of the measure would not press it further during this session of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—
Mr. ALLEN. I desire to object—
Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Maryland will allow the Senator from Delaware to proceed and finish his remarks. There is no desire on this side to delay the appropriation bills.

Mr. GORMAN. I appeal to the Senator from Delaware to give way, so that we may proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Delaware can finish his speech on that bill.

Mr. GORMAN. And if the Senator from Delaware desires to go on with his speech, well and good. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion of the Senator from Maryland to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill is a privileged motion, and the Chair submits it to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to make a remark in regard to the matter. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me, I will state that the Senator from Maryland in the statement he has just made urges as a reason why the Senate should now proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill the shortness of time.

Mr. GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BUTLER. And that the appropriation bills might be jeopardized if we do not proceed to their consideration promptly. It must be borne in mind that the Senate devoted nearly two weeks to the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill and the Post-Office appropriation bill for no other purpose on earth, as it appeared to me, than to kill time. Now, at this hour, when there are other very important measures which have been clamoring for recognition in this body—

Mr. GORMAN. I must suggest that debate is not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator from Maryland objects to my making this statement.

Mr. GORMAN. I object to debate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the motion of the Senator from Maryland to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP]. Were he present I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inquire if the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 12; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8479) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, I am only too happy to indicate by my vote on the question of taking up the appropriation bill that I have no disposition at all to delay the speedy passage of the appropriation bills and the discharge by the Senate of its duties at this stage of the session. But on this measure I desire to conclude the very brief remarks I wish to make upon the subject which was lately before the Senate.

As I was stating at the time I was interrupted, the object of the silver purchase repeal act was to force the nations of Europe into the adoption of international bimetalism. That was the remedy of the friends of silver in that regard. We believed that in such action we were its true friends, and my main reason for feeling it necessary that some one on this floor, anyone possibly better than myself, should not permit the vote of two days ago and yesterday in the Senate, in taking up the bill of the Senator from Arkansas for the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the United States to pass without putting upon record the facts which have justified those who voted for the repeal of the purchase act.

Events have been culminating very rapidly lately. Only last week, on Friday and Saturday, the German Reichstag actually adopted a resolution for the calling of another international monetary conference. I do not know whether Senators have considered and realized the great significance of that action. France was the only nation hitherto that was willing to cooperate with the United States or the great powers of the world in calling a conference. Germany always declined. She attended the conferences by her delegates; but call one, never. It was no other than Germany who initiated the demonetization of silver and put upon the world this great problem. We have had the interesting statement from Prince Bismarck that when he did it upon the unification of the German Empire he made a colossal blunder and mistake, and that if he were still the chancellor of that great Empire he would give his influence to the correction of it. That statement was made to Mr. William D. Kelley in the lifetime of the latter, and his son, Count Bismarck, also made the statement to a gentleman who personally told it to me. To-day the resolutions of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] and the bill of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] come into the Senate in the face of Germany on her knees as the consequence of the great action of the United States in November, 1893, in stopping the further purchase of silver.

How does it stand in England, the great obstruction to the solution of this problem? Germany demonetized silver on the doctrine and idea that because England did not coin silver freely and England was prosperous, therefore if Germany did not coin silver freely Germany would be prosperous. So it all goes back to England. She is the cause of all this trouble. Mr. President, England to-day is sharing in the suffering which the demonetization of silver is putting upon the world.

The disparity of the metals, affecting every nation acutely, affects none more than it does her. What do we see politically as the result? When the Parliament met two or three weeks ago the first test that was made between the two parties contending for the Government, the first question raised by the opposition in reply to the speech from the throne, was a motion in respect of the depression and suffering that is going on in the British Isles. On that question the majority for the Government was but 14, and yesterday the majority for the Government was but 8. Behind those reduced and lowering majorities stands this profound depression brought about in England by the demonetization of silver, which threatens to overthrow the Liberal government and bring in a Conservative government.

Mr. President, this is nothing but currency and commercial war. I do not dispute that the United States is suffering; I do not dispute that we are suffering losses, and grave losses; that it is a heavy weight which our agriculture and our trade are carrying, but was ever war conducted without loss? Our silver-coinage friends year before last charged us with running from the field and doing what foreign countries wanted. On the contrary, the repeal act was a declaration at once of war and of independence. We have brought this very suffering home to every household in England and the Continent, whatever we may suffer here. But I believe that only by such war can a final solution of this problem be brought about.

The condition of British agriculture is nothing less than pitiful. It does not mean loss to the farmers and laborers alone, but it means the undermining and overthrow of their social structure, a great social revolution. It means the decadence and partial dispersion of the proudest aristocracy now remaining upon earth. But it does not stop with agriculture alone. It reaches every channel of trade, and it is reaching as well finance, manufactures, commerce, shipping—all alike are suffering.

At the time my remarks were interrupted I was about to call attention to the fact that one of the consequences of the purchase repeal act was that England was forced to abandon the coinage of silver in India. She did it in anticipation of our action on the repeal bill. England was told by our distinguished representatives at the Brussels conference that if the conference did not give us either the free coinage of silver or the enlarged use of it, the United States would be compelled to suspend the further purchase of silver. So, expecting that action, the British Government in India did stop the coinage; and the acts of the two governments together consentaneously brought a fall in the price of silver from somewhere in the neighborhood of 80 cents an ounce to what it is to-day, about 59 or 60 cents an ounce. To-day the silver in our American dollar, the standard dollar, is not equal to 50 cents. That is the great problem that is put upon the world.

The Indian government as a consequence of the great fall of silver finds its revenues reduced one-half. It has to make its remittances to England in gold for its fixed charges, interest upon its debt, payment for all that it purchases from England. As a consequence, that government falls off in its revenues enormously and is reduced to a necessitous condition. It has exhausted its famine fund; it has ceased the extension of its railways; it has reduced the payment to its civil service. The condition of the civil service and the members of it, the Englishmen in India, is nothing less than pitiful. They are unable longer to send their children back to England to be educated. They are brought up in India, having to compete with the dark-skinned race in a condition that makes them no better than the pariahs and outcasts with whom they have to compete.

The Indian government has at last been compelled to impose a duty of 5 per cent upon cottons in order to augment its revenue, and at once, in revolt against any such action being committed by the British Government, Manchester rises in its strength and says, "You shall not undertake to impose a duty on our cottons going to India. What have we that dependency for if it is not to keep the mouths of the operatives in Manchester and England filled?" The strength of the English Government over the Indian peoples has been that it has been just and generous and treated them fairly, but at last, through the operation of these causes, she finds the selfishness of the Englishman pitted against the selfishness and the self-interest of the Indian, and the foundation and peace of the British Empire in India is shaken to its base while Manchester is starving.

Our silver friends here insist that it is the gold trust of London that controls everything—the holders of securities, the owners of the $10,000,000,000 of securities in which Mr. Gladstone says England had invested over the world; but behind and underneath the securities and investments rests trade, prosperous trade, which builds up values and creates them. When you paralyze and destroy trade, whether it be agriculture or manufactures or commerce, you destroy that out of which profitable investment arises. So the investors of the British Empire find that they can not get away from the exigencies of the problem, and England is being brought to her knees. I say the repeal of the purchase act was a commanding act by the American people to control and settle this great problem in the interest of humanity.

Mr. President, if all accounts are not wrong, the Liberal government now tottering to its fall will not get a new lease of life by the elections about to be held in Great Britain. On the contrary, it seems on all sides to be conceded that the Conservatives will come in by a handsome majority. It is an open question as to whether Lord Salisbury will be the premier of that administration or his nephew, Mr. Balfour. The position of Mr. Balfour on the silver question is not unknown. It is open to the world. He is to-day the most conspicuous advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the British Empire and to all the nations. If he be not the premier of the next administration he will be the leader in the House of Commons. Side by side with him stands Mr. Goschen, chancellor of the exchequer of the last Conservative administration, and one of the greatest financial authorities of that empire which believes in authority and does not go to the cross-roads and backwoods, as America does, to learn about finance. Beside him is not only Mr. Chaplin, but other men of great influence and strength who will come into that government committed, as I believe it will be, to the free coinage of silver by Great Britain.

But the case would lack its peculiar feature of strength if we stopped with British opinion alone. Upon this question, Mr. President, the whole Irish vote hitherto sustaining the Liberal government will be cast with the Conservatives upon this side of the free coinage of silver. Why do I say this? Since the overthrow, and certainly since the death of Mr. Parnell, the uncrowned king of Ireland has been Archbishop Walsh. His interview in the Freeman's Journal, reprinted in a pamphlet and accessible to everyone, and read doubtless by all, is one of the most luminous and powerful expositions of the effect upon agriculture of the present silver problem and the disparity of the metals that has ever been formulated.

Archbishop Walsh calls attention to the fact that the Irish tenant can get an interest in the freehold in two ways—one by having his rent judicially fixed for fifteen years at a certain payment per annum, and the other, that he can purchase the land outright by payment of a fixed charge for forty-nine years and get aid from the Government by way of mortgage upon his lands for the initial payments. He then calls attention to the fact that the tenant thus becoming a tenant for fifteen years at a fixed rental or a purchaser at a fixed payment for forty-nine years has his obligations fixed; while by the continued fall of silver and the continued, consequent, and concurrent fall of grain and the produce of the soil, it takes twice the product of the land to pay the fixed charges. His obligations remain the same while his resources from the land are cut in half; and, stretched upon the rack, he is brought to this dire extremity by the repeal by the present Congress of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act and the suspension of the coinage in India. I consider that whatever else may be problematic, the certainty is that when the new government comes in you will find all the Irish vote cast with the Conservatives for the free coinage of silver. It will not be as it was in the present government when they proposed such action while Mr. Gladstone still remained premier and were met by his threat that if they pressed their motion he would withdraw from the government. That is all passed. They withhold now because they are giving a free hand to the Liberal government to enact home rule; but with the incoming and Conservative government home rule becomes a matter of agitation and not of legislation, and there is nothing to restrain them any longer from voting for their interest on this great question.

Now, Mr. President, those are the consequences of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. That is the justification for our conduct, and this is my justification for taking up the time of the Senate this morning in not allowing the resolutions and bill to go to a vote without putting upon record these facts, in order that the country and the world may see the experience under which we are acting and the opinions which govern the conduct of at least some of us on this question.

If it were possible for the resolutions of the Senator from Colorado or the bill of the Senator from Arkansas to be enacted into law in the face of these facts, I ask any friend of silver would it not be untold and preternatural folly to take such a course. If this great Government, this people of 70,000,000, have with gravity and deliberation started out upon a policy and that policy has produced such pregnant results, would you stop midway before it had had an opportunity to carry it out to its complete effects, and in the face of such profound changes of opinion in the great nations of the world, without whom this silver problem can not be entirely settled and solved?

I say if the resolutions and the bill could become law, if it was possible for them to become law, their promoters and supporters might well pause before pressing them to a vote in the light of these facts. But no legislation is proposed. The bill is substantially withdrawn; the resolutions remain, and the vote remains that was taken here two days ago on this subject.

It seems to me, Mr. President, not speaking as an Eastern man, not speaking as one who has assumed to be the custodian of the interests of silver, whether it be of the silver miners or of the debtor class of the community, that it is an act of untold injury to the cause of silver that we shall undertake to cast any doubt or any discredit upon the steadiness of the maintenance of this policy by the Government. That is the great issue that is brought before the Senate and the people. We may pass appropriation bills and avoid extra sessions of Congress. We may go on with our housekeeping; we may oil the machinery of Government; we may fill the mouths of our public servants whom we have in our pay; but, Mr. President, under this whole people now writhing in distress is the issue that is brought up by our repeal of the purchase act by these resolutions, and the bill of the Senator from Arkansas, undertaking to weaken the force of the attack of the 70,000,000 of Americans upon the strong front theretofore presented to us by united Europe.

Mr. President, I rejoice to know that the President of the United States stands as a barrier to the enactment of any such legislation, and that it can not be passed by the House of Representatives. I regret more than I can tell the vote that was taken here two days ago flippantly and lightly as children going to a May fair, as if on the votes that were cast were not given the momentous weight of this great body and its majority in telling the nations of the world that we were not serious in the act we passed two years ago, and if they only wait long enough we would let up on them and begin silver coinage by ourselves alone, so that India would be relieved from her distress, and Manchester would be relieved from her distress, and English agriculture relieved from its distress, and German agriculture and trade from their distress, and they again would be happy at our expense, and the silver question would not be solved.

Mr. President, it seemed to me in the face of that vote that something was needed to be said here in the teeth of the friends of silver for the sake of silver. I want the free coinage of silver, but I do not want it at 50 cents on the dollar or 50 or 60 cents on the ounce. I want our miners to prosper, but not to prosper at that cost. I want the marvelous resources of the Rocky Mountains and of our mines all to be brought forth at $1.2929 an ounce, with silver restored to its equality with gold. I want this problem to be solved for the whole world.

It is said that so much silver can be produced that it is no longer of any good as a money metal. The increase in the output of gold is quite as great as the increase in the output of silver, and both together are not as great as the increase of the realm and extent of commercial exchanges of mankind. I believe that we want a solution of this question that shall broaden the coin base of money metals, of money of redemption and money not needed, to be redeemed; that will carry easily the whole superstructure of credit that is needed for the development of the world and its industry and the prosperity of the people. That can not be done, in my belief, by the free coinage of silver by the United States alone. What we want to destroy is the disparity. What we want to rehabilitate is the parity. What we want to make of silver is not a disparaged metal. We do want and we need and the world needs that it shall be as good as gold; and now, when by our act we are bringing about that consummation so devoutly to be wished, we have thrust in our face the bill and the resolutions which are now pending that tend to check it and put it all aside.

Mr. MANDERSON. With the kind permission of the Senator from Delaware, he has reached that part of his remarks where I think it proper to suggest that I have drawn an amendment to the resolutions of the Senator from Colorado, which I understand have gone to the Calendar, that adds to the first section of the resolution the words I beg leave to read. The first resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the welfare and prosperity of the United States require the enactment of a law for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

I propose to add the following proviso:

Provided, That efforts should be pressed by the United States to induce international bimetallicism, and any legislation for free coinage of silver should provide for the maintenance of the parity between both metals, to which the faith of this country has been repeatedly pledged.

I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table, to be considered if the resolution should come up again for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I introduce it now, as it is in the line of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, I do not know that I have much more to add to what I have just said. The testimony of the last year and a quarter carries with it great significance and great importance and moment to the people of this country as it does to the world. It becomes apparent that those countries which are under the silver standard alone find that it operates in their foreign trade as a bounty upon exports and a duty upon imports, or rather a protection against imports. That is the result in the Straits Settlements. That is the result in China. That is the result in India except so far as the disparity of the metals is checked in India by the artificial arrangements of the Indian government in attempting to give an artificial value to the rupee such as there is given to our silver dollar, which, as we all know, circulates as of equal value and purchasing power with gold.

Mexico has flourished under the silver standard. Japan has flourished. China has not gone back. The Straits Settlements have gone ahead. Everywhere it operates as a stimulus to manufactures and trade. There would be certain advantages in this country from our going to a silver standard, I am perfectly free to admit; but, on the other hand, we are the borrowers from Europe of an enormous amount of capital used in the development of this great and growing country of ours. We would have those fixed charges to meet in the coin in which we contracted, and we would have put upon us, in the event of our going to the silver standard alone and the continued disparity of the metals, as great a burden as that under which India is groaning in like case now.

Therefore, it seems to me that we ought to let well enough alone; that having taken our course in 1893 in the repeal of the purchasing act, it being impossible to change it by legislation, it would be wise upon the part of our silver friends not to undertake to weaken the force of that great policy, not to do it in the interest of the cause for which they speak, of the metal of which they have made themselves the champion, and, least of all, that they should do it because they may be disposed to play politics. The best politics, Mr. President, is to stand firmly by the course that was taken by the Congress after great consideration and out of which so much hopefulness has grown, and possibly so much of prosperity will come to this country and to the world.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, in deference to the prevailing opinion of New England, and because it may be unwise to open our own mints to the unlimited coinage of silver, without concurrent action upon the part of other great nations, I shall vote against the resolution offered by the Senator from Colorado.

But I very much regret that I can not also now vote in favor of some affirmative measure in the direction of bimetallicism, to promote which the Republican party is sacredly pledged by the promises of its national convention in 1892, which, as yet, nothing has been done to redeem.

Bimetallicism, as I understand it, is the use of gold and silver as money metals, each equally entitled to coinage as money in the mints of the bimetallic nations. It is the principle of bimetallicism that with such coinage at a ratio established by a consensus, there can be no inferiority of either metal to the other. Each will always be of the same comparative value with the other. As neither is of great intrinsic value, the market value of both is derived from their use jointly as money metals, and neither can depreciate in value as long as both are used as money. The discoverers and producers of either metal in unusual quantities are entitled to the profits of their enterprises and labors. At one time the proportion of new gold may increase, at another time that of new silver may preponderate; but as time runs the alternations will balance each other, and all the gold and silver, being the coined money of the world, will forever measure all the world's values. This is the bimetallicism to secure and preserve which the Republican party is bound, and from the support of which no Republican can be released without the utterance of a new national convention of his party.

Bimetallicism has been attacked and destroyed by England, the great creditor nation of the world. England's demonetization of silver has been up to this time acquiesced in by the United States. It is folly to say that silver is a money metal merely because we use it for subsidiary coinage and maintain the parity with gold of our present limited quantity of coined silver dollars. As long as our mints are absolutely closed to the coinage of silver bullion we shall be fast approaching a single gold standard; if we have not already reached it. Gold monometallism is our destiny if some affirmative action in another direction is not soon taken.

Against the adoption for America of the single gold standard it is my duty to speak and act, in accordance with the pledges of my party and with the interests of the great mass of the American people, debtors, producers, and property owners.

It may be, it doubtless is, the pathway of strength and honor for the National Government to pay all its existing obligations in gold. But that is a small branch of the pending question. It is agreed by all writers on political economy and the question of money that a diminution in the quantity of the metallic money causes an appreciation of the remainder and produces a fall in the prices of all commodities. If there are $4,000,000,000 of gold and $4,000,000,000 of silver in existence, constituting together the world's measure of value, and one-half the quantity is abandoned as a money metal and measure of value, the other half appreciates in value and destruction comes to the values of all other property, while the debts of the world remain unreduced. This brings insolvency to debtors and ruin to business enterprises.

To such a fate the people are now exposed. To what extent other causes than the demonetization of silver have brought about the distressing condition in which this country has found itself for the last two years it is not clear. But I can not avoid the conclusion that the adoption of the single gold standard has helped to produce the impending calamity. It is not, as I have said, a question of paying the public debt, or whether it shall be paid in gold or in silver. That debt is insignificant compared with the thousands of millions of obligations which weigh with crushing force upon the millions of our fellow-countrymen, equal to or greater in amount than they were a few years ago, while in the meantime half the world's money has been stricken from existence, and the prices of all property, from which debtors must derive the means to make their payments, have gone down one-half.

If, with the fall of one-half in the prices of commodities, the debts of the people were also scaled down one-half, we might possibly go forward on a single gold standard to revived business prosperity. But with the debts and the prices as they now are, widespread bankruptcies are, in my belief, to blight and curse the country in the months and years now close at hand, and the return of full prosperity will long be deferred.

Therefore, the people of this Republic will vote against the single gold standard. The time is approaching when it will be necessary for the Republican party to present some affirmative measures of bimetalism. What those measures shall be must be determined by the wisest members of that party, which is soon to control, by an overwhelming majority, the popular branch of Congress. The bimetalism we have promised must be reached, or steps toward it must be taken, or the American voters will decide between gold monometallism as the one alternative and silver monometallism as the other. It is useless to shut our eyes to the fact that the debtors are more numerous than the creditors, and that the citizens who want prices of property to go up outnumber those who want them to remain as they now are. Bimetalism has been promised to the people of this country. They wait with much impatience for the fulfillment of the pledges solemnly made by both political parties.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say on this subject.

Mr. CALL. I hope Senators will remember that the appropriation bill is now before the Senate for consideration. I ask that the bill may be read.

Mr. MANDERSON. We can not hear the Senator from Florida on this side.

Mr. CALL. I say that I hope Senators will remember that the appropriation bill is now before the Senate, and I ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the bill. The Senator from Virginia may then make his speech.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not hear the Senator's request.

Mr. CALL. I say the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian service is now before the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. I was perfectly aware of that fact.

Mr. CALL. It is proper that the bill should be formally laid before the Senate and the reading proceed. Then the Senator from Virginia may upon any motion he may see fit to make proceed to make his remarks.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say upon this subject.

Mr. CALL. I will yield to the Senator from Virginia if he desires to proceed now.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The Senator from Virginia was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CALL. Then I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will state his point of order.

Mr. CALL. The point of order is that the Indian appropriation bill was by unanimous consent to be taken up at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], and the bill has not yet been formally laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the clerks that the bill has been formally laid before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. CALL. Then the bill is not in order for discussion until it has been read or some portion of it read, and some objection raised to the text of the bill. I am willing to give way to the Senator from Virginia for a short period of time if he desires it; but I thought it proper that the fact should be recognized that the bill is now before the Senate for action by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no right to assume that the Senator from Virginia is not going to address himself to the appropriation bill, and therefore the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that the point of order is that the bill is not formally before the Senate until the Secretary proceeds with its reading and some action is taken upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks otherwise, and recognizes the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. If I may be pardoned, I do not wish to interpose any objection to the Senator from Virginia proceeding, but the Senate, by unanimous consent, agreed that the appropriation bill should be taken up, and it seems to me, with great respect to the occupant of the chair, that the Senator from Florida is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken. The bill was taken up by a vote of the Senate, not by unanimous consent, and it has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; but it has not been read, and it is not open to be discussed until after it has been read. When the Senator from Florida says that he makes no objection, but will yield to the Senator from Virginia for his remarks, I do not think an erroneous ruling on a doctrine of parliamentary law should be resorted to. It is the right of the person having the bill in charge to have it read, if he sees fit, before it is debated, and that has not been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill has been formally laid before the Senate, and the Chair can not assume in advance what will be the character of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the proposition. The proposition of the Senator from Florida was that when the bill is laid before the Senate it must be read at length before the debate proceeds, unless that is waived by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes a different view of it.

Mr. HOAR. From that I appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair, the Chair will submit the appeal to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. In order to avoid any difficulty about it, if the Senator from Virginia makes the request, I yield to him.

Mr. DANIEL. I probably should have concluded my remarks before this time but for the desire of Senators to make these small points. If I have the floor, I will proceed, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I propose to address a few words in reply to the able speech which has just been made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS]. He has drawn a dismal and pitiful picture of the distress now pervading the civilized world, and with an air of triumph—

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DANIEL. I decline to yield. I can not be interrupted in the midst of a sentence.

Mr. TURPIE. I was about to appeal to the Senator from Virginia to allow me to submit a resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I must decline to yield. I should be very glad to gratify the Senator from Indiana in extending any courtesy in my power; but I do not think, when Senators get up to make a few remarks, especially those who have drawn but very lightly upon the attention of the Senate, that they should be interrupted in the midst of a sentence by appeals at this hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. I was about to say that the Senator from Delaware had drawn a dismal and pitiful picture of the distresses which are now pervading the civilized world. They are widespread, and I might say extend "from Greenland's icy mountains" to "India's coral strand," and, with an air of triumph, the Senator has said "this is our justification for the repeal of the Sherman law," as if devastation and ruin were one of the prime objects of legislation. While that Senator has called attention to starving Manchester and to confused and degraded India, he has told us but little of the distress which pervades our own country, and flows partially at least from that ill-conceived and ill-considered action. It was not with the prophecy that distress would be its result that that act was repealed.

There sat by the side of the Senator when he uttered those sentences the leader of the repealers (the senior Senator from Ohio), and there, on the records of the Senate, is his brilliant and rosy prophecy that if the Senate would consent to follow his leadership prosperity would return to this country in ten days; it was to be instantaneous, and it was to come through the restoration of confidence. Boards of trade and commercial bodies from all parts of this land predicated their appeal to the Senate to repeal that law upon very different grounds from those which the Senator now refers to with an air of triumph.

The last time I had the honor to say a word upon the financial subject to the Senate was on the 14th day of September, 1893, when I undertook to predict what would be the consequences of that act. I appeal to the records of a gloomy history to show that every prophecy which was made by those who opposed its unconditional repeal have been fulfilled, and that not a single prophecy of those who clamored for it has been fulfilled.

In the first place, Mr. President, I predicted then that the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law would be followed by the further decline in the price of silver bullion and consequent increased difficulty of its restoration. That prophecy has come true.

In the next place, I predicted that it would be followed by a further decline of prices of property, of produce, and of securities. The so-called confidence, which was to pour a golden flood over the country, did not come, but falling prices have continued in an unbroken stream.

In the next place, I predicted that that repeal would be followed by the decline of our national, our State, and our municipal revenues. We know how this has immediately and continuously taken place. In his report for 1893 the Secretary of the Treasury estimated that the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, would exceed the receipts by $28,000,000. Time wore on. There was a deficit of $69,803,260. That is $41,803,260 in excess of the calculation. In his report of December 3, 1894, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the deficit for the current fiscal year at $20,000,000. At the end of January the deficit was $34,754,290, and falling revenues, which have attended the last dire results in India, have occurred in the United States, and now, as we are told by the President, we confront a predicament. State, county, and city revenues have manifested similar conditions.

In the next place, I predicted that the repeal of the Sherman law would inevitably be followed by the increase of taxes. After that act had been repealed Congress was assembled to revise the tariff taxes; and lo! the internal-revenue taxes had to be increased in order to supply the deficit, and a tax upon raw sugar had to be imposed in order to prevent a greater deficit. Now, a deficit, a fall in revenues, and an increase of taxes are still problems which confront us.

In the next place, I predicted that it would probably necessitate the increase of the public debt. Let the $162,000,000 of additional debt, which is now to be paid out of the revenues of an overstrained and overburdened people, be the answer to that prophecy.

In the next place, I predicted that, instead of stopping the withdrawal of gold from this country, the gold drain would continue. Senators have time and again upon this floor, and the public press throughout the country in some quarters, have endeavored to make the American public believe, and have probably themselves been of the opinion, that it was the condition of our currency which led to the throwing of European securities upon the American market, and it was alleged by them that if you would only repeal the Sherman law instead of foreign securities being continuously thrown upon the American market, the stream of gold would flow from England and from Europe to replenish our diminishing stock.

No sooner had that act become a law than foreign securities were heaped upon the American market in increasing quantities in anticipation of catching the rise in price, which it was predicted would at least momentarily ensue; and still gold goes away in a continually ebbing tide from our shores and foreign securities continue to seek a market in America. It was not in consequence of our disordered currency that foreign securities were being thrown upon our market; it was because of the disordered condition of the Old World, in which she, being hard up for money, was obliged to sell what she had in order to get money. Great Britain was obliged to throw her securities upon the market to sustain her investments in South America, in Australia, and in all quarters of the globe, and that fact, misinterpreted by our superficial financiers, led to a false diagnosis of the case, and the surgeons have plunged the knife into the patient, who only needed their kind and nursing care.

In the next place, I predicted that it would strengthen the cause of monometallism, and that immediately it would be claimed by those who struck down the Sherman law that now we had gone to a gold standard, and must proceed. "No," they said, "not so; we stand up here in the Senate and pledge ourselves that just so soon as this law is repealed we will bring forward a bill to restore silver." Mr. President, that was a year and a quarter ago. The sands in the glass mark the near approach of the time when the party which came into power in triumph, with every department of the Government in its control, will depart from power. It is true a bill has been presented, but at so late an hour that no man anticipates its passage, and the Democratic party, which came into power charged by the American people with a task and with a pledge of coining both gold and silver without discrimination, and of taking the tax off State banks, is about to retire from power with neither pledge redeemed.

So urgent were those Senators who were of the same opinion as the Senator from Delaware to repeal that act that they attached to it their solemn pledge for the continued coinage of silver, and there it is registered upon our statute books the solemn pledge of the American Congress, signed and approved by our President, that that should be done. Is good faith to creditors the only good faith that honest men are bound by? Is there no good faith of American representatives to the American people who make them trustees of the sovereign powers that reside in them? Are promises to pay money to be held up before us, and are promises to provide money wherewithal that payment may be made to be ignored?

In the next place, Mr. President, I predicted then that that assault upon our bimetallic system would be followed by an effort to withdraw the greenback, and that the difficulty which the country confronted with the Sherman law in existence would be intensified by repealing that law without putting a substitute in its place.

If I may be permitted to do so, I shall read a few words from the speech which on the 14th of September, 1893, I had the honor here to make:

As soon as the Sherman law was repealed it would be immediately claimed that all of our silver money was a mere subsidiary money, to be redeemed in gold.

Our stock of gold in the Treasury available for redemption purposes is about $100,000,000, and it is now charged with the redemption of $112,000,000 of uncovered paper money. In addition to this, it would be instantly charged with the redemption, also, of some $600,000,000 of silver certificates and silver dollars, making over $1,000,000,000 of subsidiary money resting on a gold basis of $100,000,000, or an inflation of a billion of paper money on the unbankable basis of 10 to 1.

If there be lack of confidence now in silver money, would not that lack of confidence be immediately intensified? Would it be possible for this slender and overstrained stock of gold to redeem this vast volume of other money? Might not the shock which we now feel be merely a tremor compared to that which would possibly result from the contraction of our metallic base, it being impracticable with present resources in gold to support the redemption of so large a volume of money? Confronting that condition, two alternatives would be presented to us to follow:

1. The Congress and the President would be urged to withdraw the greenback circulation of $346,000,000, an idea which was recommended by Daniel Manning when Secretary of the Treasury, and which may now lurk behind the silent statement who demand unconditional repeal of the Sherman Act and no more, although none are bold enough to say that it was the cause of this trouble.

2. If this further contraction of our currency, with all the miseries in its train with which we are familiar, is not the mysterious plan behind this movement, then the increase of the national debt must become the other inevitable alternative.

In order to provide gold to save the Treasury, should there be a rush of silver or greenbacks for redemption, the issue of bonds would be proposed. Will confidence then be restored when the already overtaxed gold resources are thus assailed? On the contrary, confidence will be weakened, and those who have been urging the President to order or recommend the issue of bonds to provide gold will renew their demand, and it must be granted or the attempted gold system will collapse and fall and bury the honor of our country in its ruins.

There, Mr. President, in these fulfilled predictions is my justification and the justification of the Democrats and Republicans upon this floor who coincided with me for not voting to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law without providing before its repeal for a system which should take its place; and if it be any pleasure to the Senator from Delaware, or to those who are acting with him, to point to the miseries of mankind in India, in Great Britain, and in America, and say, "This is our justification," then, sir, he is welcome to all the comfort he can get out of it and to all the praise which he may elicit from his so-called justification.

Mr. President, I did not cling to the Sherman law because I was in favor of it per se. I knew at the time it was enacted that it was a mere makeshift, and I predicted the consequences that would flow from it. But then was the hour when the new system should have been organized and acted upon; then was the accepted time, when in majority in both Houses and a Democratic President in the White House, the party was fully empowered to keep its pledges, to preserve its faith with a great people who had intrusted it, and to substitute their own wise and considerate legislation for the makeshifts of Shermanism. They allowed the timely hour to pass, and to-day their action can only be justified in such language as has been employed by the Senator from Delaware, who points with pride and satisfaction and comfort to the miseries of mankind.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations may be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill, and that the committee amendments be first considered before other amendments are offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to the end of the clause in line 8, page 2, providing for the pay of an Indian agent at Cheyenne River Agency, S. Dak.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose none but committee amendments are now in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was the understanding.

Mr. PLATT. I think when the bill shall have been read through I should like to propose a change in the name of the agency in line 7.

Mr. CALL. Let the committee amendments be considered first.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of the clause, line 19, page 5, making provision for the pay of an Indian agent at the Sisseton Agency, S. Dak.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to know whether individual amendments are now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not.

Mr. KYLE. Not until the reading of the bill is finished?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

At the Western Shoshone Agency, Nev., $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 18, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

At the Yankton Agency, S. Dak., $1,000; in all, $86,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 17, after the word "one," to strike out "Indian school superintendent" and insert "superintendent of Indian schools;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one superintendent of Indian schools, $3,000.

Mr. VEST. Is that an amendment of the committee?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is simply a change in the name. The other House used the language "one Indian school superintendent," which is not the proper designation. It should be "one superintendent of Indian schools." The amendment does not change the salary or anything else except simply to give the officer his proper designation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, after line 18, to insert:

For pay of one secretary to the superintendent of Indian schools, to be employed by him, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 23, after the word "schools," to insert "and his secretary when necessary," and in line 24, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For necessary traveling expenses of one superintendent of Indian schools, and his secretary when necessary, including telegraphing and incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 2, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And no person shall be employed as such farmer or stockman who has not been at least five years immediately previous to such employment practically engaged in the occupation of farming.

So as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ practical farmers, and practical stockmen, in addition to the agency farmers now employed, at wages not exceeding $75 each per month, to superintend and direct farming and stock raising among such Indians as are making effort for self-support, $70,000, and no person shall be employed as such farmer or stockman who has not been at least five years immediately previous to such employment practically engaged in the occupation of farming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 7, after the word "each," to insert "of Indian police;" so as to read:

For services of officers, at $15 per month each, and privates at $10 per month each, of Indian police, to be employed in maintaining order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 7, before the word "treaty," to insert "same;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of physician and teacher, as per thirteenth article of same treaty, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator in charge of the appropriation bill to permit me to call up House bill 8499, which can be passed without discussion. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CALL. Is there any special reason why the bill should be passed at this time?

Mr. ALLEN. There are special reasons why it should be passed.

Mr. CALL. I will yield if it leads to no debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. Mr. ALLEN. There is an amendment.

Mr. QUAY. What is the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a bill for the consideration of which the Senator from Nebraska asked unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is a bill which I objected to this morning, and since then an agreement has been reached between the various parties by the amendment which is about to be read. It authorizes the construction of a bridge at Sioux City.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 7 and insert:

This act shall take effect in one year after its approval, and shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date it takes effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GORMAN, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. FRYE were appointed.

YELLOWSTONE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. POWER. Will the Senator from Florida yield to allow me to call up and finish the consideration of a bill which was read this morning?

Mr. CALL. I yield if it leads to no debate.

Mr. POWER. It will lead to no debate. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6750) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in the county of Dawson, State of Montana.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator from Florida yield for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. CALL. I consented that these two bills, which were in an unusual condition, might be considered. We were interrupted by a message from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. 2426) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in the county of Dawson, State of Montana, will, without objection, be indefinitely postponed.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair) laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

R. 8479) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 12, after the word "relief," to insert "and civilization;" in line 13, after the word "Minnesota," to insert "approved January 14, 1889;" and in line 16, after the word "act," to insert "reimbursable;" so as to make the clause read:

This amount as advance interest to the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, as required by section 7 of "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the manner required by said act, reimbursable, $90,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 20, after the word "Minnesota," to strike out "and for other purposes;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how he expects the Secretary of the Interior to expend this money in the civilization of the Indians. I refer to the provision on page 39, to provide for the payment of interest on certain Indian indebtedness, which says:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to expend said interest for the support, education, and civilization of said Indians.

I should like to ask the Senator if there is any restriction upon the expenditure of this money.

Mr. CALL. That provision is for the support, education, and civilization of the Indians. That is the language used in all these provisions for the expenditure of money made by such appropriations.

For interest on $804,909.17, at 5 per cent per annum, per fourth article of treaty of November 1, 1837, and joint resolution of July 17, 1862, $40,245.45; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to expend said interest for the support, education, and civilization of said Indians.

I will say to the Senator that that is the language of the treaty and it is the language used on all occasions in all the acts of Congress on this subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I think that the language employed is altogether too broad. "Civilization" embraces all things. It embraces support and education of all kinds. I think there ought to be some restriction placed upon the Secretary of the Interior in the expenditure.

Mr. CALL. What amendment does the Senator suggest?

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that there be stricken out—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please suspend for a moment. The Chair will state that by unanimous consent the bill was to be read through and the committee amendments first considered. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be in order after that arrangement has been carried into effect.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not know but that by calling the attention of the committee to this matter it might be corrected now by striking out the words "and the civilization of said Indians" and inserting the word "and" between the words "support" and "education;" so as to read:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to expend said interest for the support and education of said Indians.

Mr. CALL. We can not do that now. We had better let the reading of the bill proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 40, line 7, after the word "Superior," to insert "Wisconsin;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Chippewas of Lake Superior, Wisconsin, to be expended for agricultural and educational purposes, pay of employees, including pay of physician, at $1,200, purchase of goods and provisions, and for such other purposes as may be deemed for the best interests of said Indians, $7,125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 14, after the word "Chippewas," to insert "Minnesota;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of Chippewas of Red Lake and Peppina tribe of Chippewas, Minnesota, and for pay of employees, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

For support and civilization of Carlos's band of Flatheads, Montana, including pay of employees, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 11, after the word "tribes," to insert "Montana;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Flatheads and other confederated tribes, Montana, including pay of employees, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in Arizona and New Mexico, $25,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to get some information in regard to the paragraph now proposed to be amended from Senators most familiar with the matter, especially from the honorable Senator from Colorado on my left [Mr. TELLER], formerly Secretary of the Interior.

For several months many of us received numerous letters from highly respectable sources, including among them societies organized for the benefit of the civilization of the Indians, representing that there was very great danger that many of the Navajoes would be starving this winter. The Navajoes are a very capable people, numbering about 18,000. Before they were what may be called subjugated they were a pastoral people, doing something with crops and having large flocks of sheep and herds of horses. They have retained those flocks and herds, and have increased them. I do not pretend to say how many thousand sheep they now own, but their wool crop is very well known and their ancient ingenuity in weaving very valuable blankets is still more well known. Nevertheless, the question of irrigation is a very serious one with them. The dry season takes away the crops of corn and prevents them from obtaining the usual crop.

In short, for these and other reasons not necessary to mention, it was believed by very many people that there was serious danger of actual starvation amongst those Indians. Capt. Constant Williams, an officer of the Army, who was detailed to be Indian agent for these tribes and to look after the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, but more especially he was connected with the Navajoes, represented not that those Indians were actually starving perhaps, but that there was indeed serious danger; that there were many instances of great suffering.

I, and I presume others like me, made inquiries of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I was told that the starvation of the Navajoes was practically impossible because they are thorough-going communists, and as long as there is a single sheep surviving it is the property equally of each one of those 18,000 people. Nevertheless one can imagine them as being separated in the winter; and scattered somewhat widely, and there might be squads or small bands of them who would be very much in danger of suffering. But the danger was represented not only by Capt. Constant Williams in formal and temperate dispatches of his own, but by urgent letters from missionaries and private citizens, who were more or less familiar with the matter. So that, as a matter of fact, many of our people believed the Indians were in a starving condition, and there were considerable contributions and sums of money sent there for disbursement among those who were in special danger. The reports we could get from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, who were both entirely reasonable and obliging, so far as communicating information was concerned, and what was said by private parties unofficially in respect to the condition of these people, were conflicting, and there appeared to me to be considerable danger. I was told that the Department would relieve this tribe to some extent by purchasing their wonderful blankets.

Mr. President, the Navajo blanket, which those Indians manufacture, is a very beautiful and expensive article, and is a matter of great time, and could only be regarded as profitable where time practically is no element in the question. Those blankets are very fine indeed, but I can not conceive of a people resorting hastily to the sale of Navajo blankets to get bread for to-morrow. That was decidedly a weak suggestion. What has resulted from it has been an assurance to some of us from the Secretary of the Interior that the Indians should not be allowed to starve; and also it results in the lines in italics here on page 41—

Of which sum—

That is, $225,000—

$25,000 shall be immediately available.

I understand—and I should be glad to have authentic or, I might say, official assurance of it—that the object of making that special use of the $25,000 is to put that sum of money at the command of the Secretary of the Interior, who may use it wherever it may be necessary to prevent starvation.

I call attention to these matters and refer to my friend on my left [Mr. TELLER], partly that I may be able to send some copies of the RECORD containing the report of these proceedings to the good people in different States who have been very much alarmed lest the Government should be cruel and neglectful in this matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Navajoes are substantially self-supporting, and have been for a great many years, the Government only making appropriations for the agency employees and a small amount for medical and other supplies or something of that kind, amounting, I think, generally heretofore to about $70,000 a year.

These Indians in the early part of the war went on the warpath and were severely chastised by Col. Kit Carson, who subdued them, took them prisoners, brought them in and kept them in a camp for some years, and in 1868 they were put on their present reservation. The reservation has been increased in size from time to time as the population has increased. There were about 12,000 Indians at the time they were put on the reservation, and now it is supposed they number from eighteen to twenty thousand.

In 1868 or 1869—I speak from recollection, but I believe about that date—the Government put them on this reservation and furnished them with a quantity of sheep and goats. There was an appropriation made of about $300,000 for their support; and when that was exhausted they were left to their own resources. They have done very well. They have taken care of themselves, multiplied their flocks, and cultivated the ground where they could, the country really not being very good agriculturally, being destitute of water. It is a region of country which can only be cultivated by the aid of irrigation. But they have raised some supplies, not very much, it is true, during the last three years, for there has been in that section of the country a very great drought, and they have been short of feed for their sheep, cattle, and horses. The cattle are not numerous, but the Indians have quite a large number of sheep.

I do not myself believe that they are in danger of starving, but the House committee did provide, over and above the usual appropriation for these Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, $25,000 extra. The Senate committee proposes to make that amount immediately available, so that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may at once use it. The Commissioner was before the committee and stated that he would be able to see that the Indians did not starve.

Two or three years ago, perhaps two years ago, there was an appropriation made for irrigating purposes of about $60,000. That is now being expended, and the Indians are being employed to do that work. That relieves them to some extent, as they get wages, and with this appropriation, I have no doubt, they will come through all right, because they will have some cattle and some sheep and a number of horses left.

The suggestion that these Indians could make blankets and sell them in time to accomplish anything this year was not very valuable. The ordinary blanket made by the Navajoes is a work of time. I suppose none of those blankets is made under six or eight months, and many of them require a year in construction. Their time is not valuable and the work is all done by hand in the most primitive manner, as primitive, probably, as that used by any people in the world. They use the shuttle made by staking out on the ground a loom, pounding the threads in by hand, shoving them through the wool, the filling, and the warp, and then pounding them up. The squaw always does that work, the Indian men never engage in it, and it takes a great length of time. They can not be relieved in that way. They can be relieved by this money if it is necessary that they should have relief. I very much doubt, although I think these Indians are in some destitution, whether it will be necessary to expend any considerable sum of money for their support.

I had recently a letter from a gentleman who is very well acquainted with and takes a great interest in these Indians calling my attention to the fact that they were in want; that the low price of wool last year had prevented them from realizing as much as usual, but he did not indicate that they would be in a starving condition immediately.

I believe when this bill becomes a law the Department will be well equipped to see that there is no real suffering. Indians will go hungry very frequently and will suffer severely before they will kill their sheep. These Indians will not want. They are self-supporting. I regard it as extremely desirable that they should remain so, and that they should only have Government support and food when it becomes absolutely necessary. They have never been dependent upon the Government except at the time when we took them off the country in which they had been from time immemorial and held them as prisoners of war. I remember well a conversation I had with Kit Carson, in which he told me that he made an attack upon the settlement of these Indians, who were then located below where they now are, in a more fertile region; that he went into their cornfield near daylight, when it was dark, and he had not succeeded by sundown in cutting down the corn that these Indians had planted. That must have been in 1864 or 1865. When their corn and supplies were so destroyed that they could not live, and they surrendered to the Government, as I said before, the Government kept them for some time, and then sent them to this reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 42, line 8, after the word "Indians," to insert "Indian Territory," so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Kansas Indians, Indian Territory, including agricultural assistance and pay of employees, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

For support and civilization of the Makahs, Washington, including pay of employees, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 5, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That this amount be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory and in South Dakota.

So as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Ponca Indians, including pay of employees, $15,000: Provided, That this amount be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory and in South Dakota.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this amendment ought to be modified so as to insert the word "Nebraska."

It now reads:

Provided, That this amount be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory and in South Dakota.

The words "and in the State of Nebraska" should be inserted.

The amendment should embrace that portion of the Ponca Indians residing on the Nebraska side, amounting to several hundred.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Then let the proviso be amended so that it will read:

Provided, That this amount be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory, South Dakota, and in the State of Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 7, after the word "Territory," strike out "and in," and after the word "Dakota" insert "and in the State of Nebraska;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That this amount be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory, South Dakota, and in the State of Nebraska.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Florida in charge of the bill to state what is the meaning of the committee amendment. As the appropriation of $15,000 comes from the other House it is "for the support and civilization of the Ponca Indians, including pay of employees." That amount, of course, is to be expended in a discretionary way for supporting the Indians, for bringing about their civilization, and certain employees are to be paid from it. That, I suppose, is an intelligible system, and the usual one, but the amendment of the committee entirely changes that system, and makes the appropriation not one for pay of employees, not one for the support of the Indians, not one for the civilization of the Indians, unless they choose to civilize themselves. It is simply a pro rata payment to the Indians; the same amount of money to each one of them.

I do not know whether the proviso reported by the committee would confine the payment to the males of the tribe or whether it would include the women and children, but it is head money which is appropriated, so much per capita to each member of the tribe in the Indian Territory and South Dakota. Now, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has the Ponca Indian in Nebraska included. I ask the Senator from Florida whether it is really the intention of the Senate committee to take this amount away from the Secretary of the Interior which in his discretion he can use to pay employees, to support the Indians, and to aid in various and proper methods in civilizing them, and provide that the $15,000 shall be distributed per capita among the Ponca Indians wherever they may be found, without any responsibility on the part of the Interior Department either for the pay of the employees or for the support or civilization of the Indians unless they choose to use this money to civilize themselves instead of using it for purposes not conducive to civilization. I wish to have an explanation from the Senator from Florida as to why the committee have inserted the proviso.

Mr. CALL. The chairman of the committee can answer the question more in detail than I can. The Ponca Indians, so far as I am informed, require very little in the way of agents and employees, and the remainder of this money is chiefly to be distributed amongst them, I presume, after the sums which are now authorized by law for the agents and employees shall have been deducted. Perhaps the language might be a little more definite than it is, and probably an amendment to the amendment would be acceptable.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear all the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I wish to say that a part of the Ponca Indians have a reservation in the State of Nebraska right across from the South Dakota line. The amendment reported by the committee would not embrace that portion of the Ponca tribe without expressly including the State of Nebraska.

Mr. CHANDLER. While the clause as it came from the other House without the amendment reported by our committee would cover all of the tribe wherever found?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from New Hampshire are at cross purposes. The Senator from Nebraska moved to amend the proviso by inserting the words "in the State of Nebraska." That cures that difficulty. The inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire is in respect to the language of the amendment—whether it excludes the employment of any portion of this money for the payment of agents and employees and provides that it shall go per capita among the Indians. I do not think that is the intention of the amendment. Perhaps there might be some necessity to amend the language.

Mr. ALLEN. I simply wish to explain to the Senator from New Hampshire that putting the name "Nebraska" in the amendment embraces all the territory on which the Ponca Indians are to be found. They are in the Indian Territory, in South Dakota, and in Nebraska, and nowhere else.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that very well. The proposition of the Senator from Nebraska is quite right. As long as the clause stood "the Ponca Indians," it provided for them wherever they might be found. As soon as the amendment of the committee undertook to locate them, of course the Senator from Nebraska wanted those in Nebraska included.

But the amendment of the committee is all wrong. Here are several pages of appropriations for the support and civilization of the Indians. The appropriations go right along, page after page, paragraph after paragraph, in similar language—for the support and civilization, including the pay of employees. Now, here are the Ponca Indians. I do not know whether or not the Ponca Indians are entitled to support and civilization. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] intimated to me a few minutes ago that those Indians were not entitled to any appropriation, but if they are entitled to an appropriation it is for their support and civilization, including the pay of the employees.

When the Committee on Appropriations say that so much money shall go as head money to all the members of the tribe, they utterly change the character of the appropriation. Instead of giving the Interior Department $15,000 with which to aid the Indians and to pay the employees to help take care of them, the committee are proposing to make a pro rata distribution of $15,000 among the members of the tribe. There is no ground shown by the committee for making any such change. Why should not the same provision be put in the twenty-five or thirty paragraphs? Why should not all the amounts that are to be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the support and civilization of Indians, in accordance with existing methods, be changed, so that they shall be a mere money distribution to all the Indians of the tribes, and let them support and civilize or uncivilize themselves as they see fit?

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire understand that the $15,000 is to be taken and divided pro rata among all the individual Ponca Indians wherever they may be found?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the language.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator in charge of the appropriation bill if he so understands it?

Mr. CALL. I do not. I think the language might be made a little more definite.

Mr. PLATT. I think it ought to be, so that there can be no possibility of such a construction.

Mr. CALL. I will say that the language is that of the present law for the current year. It simply follows that act. I think the criticism of the Senator from New Hampshire is correct to some extent, and that the proviso should be amended so that the residue, after paying for the necessary employees authorized by law, should be divided per capita among the Indians.

The object of the provision, I understand, is to enable the Indians to progress in their civilization, to provide them with necessary means, sometimes in the line of agriculture, sometimes stock, and for such personal uses as may be necessary for persons who are beginning to be civilized. I shall not object to making the language more definite. It simply follows, however, the language of the existing law in this respect.

Mr. PLATT. I understand from the Senator from New Hampshire that while I was temporarily out of the Chamber he said he understood from me that the Ponca Indians were not entitled to the proposed appropriations. I did not intend to be so understood. What I intended to say was that the appropriation as recommended by the committee amendment conforms to what has hitherto been done for the Ponca Indians; that is, the Indians in Kansas and South Dakota have had the benefit of the appropriation, while the suggestion to include the Ponca Indians in Nebraska is entirely new. I do not know anything about the circumstances.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill if this is the only appropriation made for the Ponca Indians? Will he also give the number of members of this tribe?

Mr. CALL. I do not find in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1893 the number of Ponca Indians. They are scattered in several portions of the country, and there is no statement here that I see as to the number. It is stated that the number of Poncas at the Ponca, Pawnee, and Otoe Agency is 578. Those who dress wholly in citizens' clothes are given at 410; the Indians who can read, 160; the Indians who can use English enough for ordinary conversation, 200; dwelling houses built by the Indians themselves during the year, 2; those occupied by Indians during the year, 100; and Indian apprentices, 5.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask also whether the committee amendment intends to divide the money per capita among those Indians?

Mr. CALL. The amendment is intended to provide that after paying the employees and agents authorized by law at that agency the residue shall be paid the Indians per capita to aid them in the general business of life.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is it to be paid to them in cash?

Mr. CALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And not in annuity goods.

Mr. CALL. It is to be paid to them in money as a part of their annuity.

Mr. PEPPER. The wording of the amendment is somewhat unfortunate, and I suggest to the Senator from Florida a change. I will read the proviso as I propose to change it, and I will then suggest to the clerks where the amendment comes in:

Provided, That this amount be apportioned among the divisions of said tribe in the Indian Territory, South Dakota, and Nebraska, according to the number in each division.

I submit that that is what the Senator desires. There are quite a number of Ponca Indians in the Indian Territory, and quite a number in South Dakota and in Nebraska. I understand the committee want to divide a certain sum among the different divisions in the different localities.

Mr. CALL. I think more definite than that which the Senator suggests is the language inserted on motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. It reads:

Provided, That this amount shall be divided pro rata among all the mem- bers of the Indian tribe in the Indian Territory, in South Dakota, and in Nebraska.

In altering this provision we should use language with precision. This has been the law for some years. The committee have followed it. There was no suggestion of any change. I have accepted the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska because if it should prove to be the case that the Nebraska Indians ought not to be included we shall have that information from the Secretary of the Interior before the bill passes. But in respect to the point suggested by the Senator from Kansas the language adopted is quite as definite as that which he proposes, dividing the amount among all the members per capita in the Indian Territory, in South Dakota, and in Nebraska.

Mr. PEPPER. I understand that the language proposed by the committee would be a per capita distribution of the money to the individual Indians without reference to their organized body. The Ponca Indians in the Indian Territory are, I know, organized. They have agents there. They have persons assisting them in learning the art of farming, etc. I suppose it is the same way in Nebraska and South Dakota. That being true, I understand the committee desires to place a certain amount among the several divisions.

Mr. CALL. Per capita, and pay it to the Indians. I submit to the Senator from Kansas that there have been great abuses growing out of the payment of the money to any others than directly to the Indians entitled to it. I suppose for that reason this language has been followed, in order that there might not be any payment to persons who would misuse the money, and so that it would go direct to the Indians. I submit to the Senator that is a better plan than to pay it to the heads of the organization.

Mr. PEPPER. With this discussion I have no doubt we now understand one another.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This provision to pay these Indians is an innovation. The practice has been among all the Sioux, and these are a part of the Sioux Indians, to pay them in annuity goods, to buy clothing and provisions, and distribute it among them. Why is an exception proposed to be made in relation to the Poncas? They are no more civilized than the other tribes of Sioux Indians. They reside, a part of them, in Nebraska and South Dakota. A part of them were removed by force to the Indian Territory many years ago. In fact, I think all of them were removed by force. Afterwards a portion of them returned overland, refusing to remain in the Indian Territory, but a few did remain. How far they may have progressed in civilization I do not know, but as to the Poncas of South Dakota and Nebraska, they are no further advanced than the other Sioux.

I am glad, however, to see the committee adopt this course and propose to pay in cash. The same rule ought to be applied to every Sioux Indian. If we are going to advance them in civilization we must place some responsibility on them; and instead of having at every agency a loafers' camp of 300 or 400 or 3,000 or 4,000 Indians who simply lie around doing nothing, waiting for issue day, we must teach them the use of money and the value of its preservation.

Several years ago the Senate adopted an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill to pay, to commute the rations and issue of clothing of these Sioux Indians and pay them in cash, but the Department refuses to take steps to advance these Indians in civilization and in the responsibilities of life. It continues to herd them upon a reservation, keeping them in indolence, feeding and clothing them until they have come to think that they are the wards of the Government, and that no further effort on their part is ever required or will ever be necessary. How are you going to make citizens of people who are pursuing a course of that sort? How are they, without responsibility, going to be other than paupers and mendicants, absolutely dependent upon our support and assistance? Civilization can never exist among them. Barbarism and worse than barbarism must be their fate. No matter what effort your missionaries may make they can give to them nothing that will take the place of the ability and the desire to care for themselves.

I say I am glad to see this change with regard to the Poncas, and before we get through with the consideration of the bill I shall offer amendments to apply the same provision to every Sioux tribe. The people of South Dakota are vitally interested in this question. These Indians are to become under the Dawes Act citizens of that State, entering into our politics, helping to control its affairs, and shaping its destiny. Therefore we are interested more than anyone else in this country in seeing that they are advanced in civilization and that they shall learn the value of property and how to preserve it. It seems to me after all there is nothing—no education at Carlisle, no education anywhere—that will take the place of learning the lesson of frugality. You may take them to Carlisle and varnish them over with a supposed and pretended civilization, but without learning the value of property and its individual ownership they return to the tribe only to sink in many cases, and in almost every instance, lower in the grade of civilization than their wild brothers upon the plains.

Mr. CALL. I have in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs containing the report of the agent in regard to the Poncas in Nebraska. The report says:

The Poncas living near Niobrara, a village of several hundred inhabitants partake somewhat of the vices of the border element, but not to the extent one would suppose from a people only partially civilized. A few of them, as among whites, are scoundrels, but the majority of the band do not countenance rowdiness. The majority are industrious, and cultivate more land and care for their crops in a better and more farming-like manner than the Santees. They are good workers, but lack the prudence and foresight of the majority of white farmers, apparently thinking that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." They appear to lack in judgment as to the value of money or merchandise, and will sometimes ask an exorbitant price for any article they may have for sale; and again, if needing a little money, will almost give a thing away in order to get it.

There is improvement in their mode of dealing since taking land in severalty, and the contact of white farmers is having a good effect. This year, instead of selling their grass upon the ground for a trifle, they are cutting and stacking more hay than any former year and holding it for sale until winter, when hay commands a better price.

The language found in the bill has been in the Indian appropriation bills for ten years, and according to the report of the agent and the report of the Commissioner the provision has worked very well. These Indians are improving; they are becoming more self-supporting; and from the statements made they have exhibited a good deal of economy and skill in farming. So, I submit to the Senator from South Dakota it would not be very wise to alter this provision, it having been made for ten years and apparently having had a good effect.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida what he reads from.

Mr. CALL. I read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1893.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to observe that that is an illustration of the falsehoods which get into our Department reports. I personally know much about these Indians, as does the Senator from South Dakota. Their reservation in Nebraska was in the judicial district over which I had the honor to preside, and much of their litigation was determined in that court. I have been among them. I know something about them. I have seen them daily. The Ponca Indian in Nebraska is exactly as the Santee Sioux Indian, as the Rosebud Sioux, and all the kindred bands up the Missouri River. They are all a semicivilized set of people, decidedly shiftless, resulting, I dare say, from the manner in which they have been treated. They have learned to believe that they have a right to depend upon the Government. They cultivate the land to a very limited extent. If you give one of them a piece of land he cultivates it very indifferently. Frequently he moves off of it and goes along the rivers and creeks and begins fishing and trapping. The statement read from the report by the Senator from Florida is wholly incorrect.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska when he was at this agency?

Mr. ALLEN. I was there less than eighteen months ago.

Mr. CALL. Can the Senator say that the statement made by this agent, that they have cultivated more grass and saved more grass and stacked more grass this year than in any previous year, is not true?

Mr. ALLEN. I can say that, because the grass has not grown there to be stacked and cut.

Mr. CALL. This report was made in 1893.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not care whether it was made in 1893 or any other year. It is not correct.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator say there is no grass there at all?

Mr. ALLEN. There was some grass there that year, but not any more than previously.

Mr. CALL. The report does not state that there was any more.

Mr. ALLEN. Their lands are not grass lands; they are hill lands. They live upon the mountain side. You might call them mountains down in Florida. They are most of them uncultivated hillsides. Of course you can occasionally find a piece of decent land. I want to say to the Senator from Florida that the Ponca Indian, like the Santee Sioux and the Brule Sioux and all that class of Indians, is a wild man, and you can not make a first-class citizen of him. You might as well undertake to tame a prairie chicken. A great many of us tried that when we were boys, but it can not be done; they will not domesticate, and these Indians will not domesticate except in a feeble and partial way.

Mr. CALL. The Committee on Appropriations have not had the advantage of the knowledge of the Senator from Nebraska upon this bill for the last ten years, and consequently they have made this appropriation as they have provided for other Indians. I see nothing in what the Senator says to contradict the statement of the agent. It may not be a grass country and yet there may be grass saved there, and the Indians may be progressive. That is what we have been trying to do with all of them. I see nothing in these criticisms on the subject. If it be hopeless to improve the Indians let the whole system be abandoned. The language in this part of the appropriation bill is just what has been inserted for the last ten years with the approval of all the authorities we are in contact with and whom we have any right to consult.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggested to the Senator from Florida the inquiry whether it was intended to make a per capita distribution of this money among the members of the Ponca tribe. The Senator from Florida says he understands that that is to be the plan, and the Senator from South Dakota approves of that method of using this money. The Senator from South Dakota says the same rule should be adopted as to all the other appropriations for the support and civilization of the various Indian tribes. If that be the case, in order to save the pay of employees under the appropriation for the Ponca Indians, I shall move an amendment so as to make the proviso read:

That this amount after paying employees shall be divided per capita among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory and in South Dakota and Nebraska.

That will make explicit the purpose which the Senator from Florida says he desires to accomplish, and it will also save the pay of the employees under the appropriation for the Ponca Indians, which would otherwise be taken away by the language of the amendment as it stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire submit that amendment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee pending, or has it been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been adopted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to insert after the words "that this amount" the words "after paying employees shall be divided per capita."

Mr. PASCO. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the amendment be stated first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "amount" strike out the words "be divided per capita" and insert "after paying employees, shall be divided per capita;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That this amount, after paying employees, shall be divided per capita among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory, South Dakota, and in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator that he add the words "authorized by law;" so as to read, "employees authorized by law."

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; that would be right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to ask who these employees are, and whether there will be any employees in case the money is distributed pro rata. I suppose the employees are for the purposes of the mission to aid in civilizing the Ponca Indians, but if there is no mission and the money is to be divided pro rata what will be the necessity to have any employees?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will endeavor to answer the Senator from Florida. All these appropriations, as the Senator will notice, for these various tribes are for support and civilization, including pay of employees. Under the new system there will be employees authorized by law, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] says. They will be paid, and they will render such services as, according to the scheme of the Indian Department, may be useful. Then, after paying the employees authorized by law, the money will be divided per capita among the members of the tribe, which the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] says is right, which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] says is right, and on that distinguished authority we ought, I think, to be willing to act.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] is anxious to know who these employees are. In most instances in the State of South Dakota they are farmers sent up from the State of Mississippi and other Southern States to teach the Indians, I suppose, how to raise cotton and sweet potatoes. They are almost all imported from the Southern States to teach the Indians of South Dakota the art of farming. They know nothing about the cultivation of the crops of that northern land; and yet they are shipped there as pensioners under the present Administration and paid out of the money that belongs to these Indians. I could name instance after instance, although I am not certain whether any of them came from Florida, and whether they are versed in the cultivation of oranges.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have just come into the Chamber. I want to know who was sent to the Senator's State from Mississippi.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is a man named Smith who was sent there as Indian agent, and he brought along several cotton raisers who have spent most of their time in drinking intoxicating liquors.

Mr. McLAURIN. From Mississippi?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLAURIN. From what part of Mississippi?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then how does the Senator know that he came from Mississippi?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Anywhere in Mississippi.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask, how does the Senator know he came from Mississippi?

Mr. PETTIGREW. When we confirmed him the Senator said the agent was from Mississippi, and that he was an ex-Confederate officer. Perhaps he learned the art of farming in the Confederate service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CALL. I accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I desire to say to my friend the Senator from South Dakota that I understand there is only one farmer from the South in his State.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is one agent and there are several farmers.

Mr. CALL. There is only one farmer, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 43, line 8, after the word "Quil-leh-utes," to insert "Washington;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Quil-nal-elts and Quil-leh-utes, Washington, including pay of employees, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 16, after the word "dollars," to insert "one-half of which sum shall be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in procuring permanent homes for said Indians;" so as to make the clause read:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Seminole Indians in Florida, $6,000, one-half of which sum shall be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in procuring permanent homes for said Indians.

Mr. PASCO. With reference to the amendment that has just been read, I ask that it may be either rejected or else modified. This appropriation has been made for several years in behalf of the Seminole Indians of Florida; it was first made during the Fiftieth Congress. Once before, in 1890, a similar provision was put in the Indian appropriation bill, and it was then proposed that the appropriation be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, but since then this appropriation of one-half the money for the purpose of obtaining permanent homes for the Indians has been omitted, and the entire $6,000 has been left for general expenditure. I have here a letter from Hon. F. A. Hendry, a gentleman living in the part of the State where the headquarters of the Seminole Indian Agency are located. He states that the Indians have not yet been sufficiently advanced in civilization to accept any provision for permanent homes, and he is opposed to an appropriation of one-half of the money for this purpose. I will state that Mr. Hendry is a very prominent citizen of south Florida, that he has represented his county in the senate and house of representatives a number of times, that he has a very thorough knowledge of the condition of these Indians, and that his opinion upon this subject is worthy of the highest consideration. He says:

FORT THOMPSON, FLA., December 17, 1891.

DEAR SENATOR: Knowing that you are interested in the Seminole Indians of your State, and would do anything looking to their betterment, I address you on and in their interest. It appears that $6,000 has been appropriated for the Seminoles of Florida, $3,000 of which is specially designated for locating them on lands of their own, homes for them, etc., and $3,000 for the usual expenses of the agency. It is fully demonstrated that the Indians will not consider for a moment the owning of land and occupying permanent homes.

The matter of locating the Florida Indians on permanent homes is something which must follow a further advanced condition of civilization. We are doing all we can down here to convince these red men the importance of actual citizenship and the owning of lands, but they are absolutely opposed to it; they simply want to be left entirely alone to enjoy the old cherished habits and customs. Dr. J. E. Breatit, our agent, I believe to be in dead earnest, and withal a very efficient man, and has done considerable labor among the Seminoles, and no doubt has taken the initiatory step toward bringing the Indians to consider the propriety of education and civilization. He needs to be among them all the time, at their homes, and have all the freedom which the Department can possibly give him. The whole of the $6,000 should be applied in field work and for defraying its incident expenses, as it can not be used for the purpose designated. Will you kindly see the Commissioner and speak of this matter and see if there be some way to apply the funds as above suggested? I am here on the ground and know whereof I speak. I could go further into details, but I deem it unnecessary, as you and I talked this matter over two years ago and you are fully advised of the condition of affairs down here.

HON. SAMUEL PASCO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

F. A. HENDRY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the amendment read, "to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

Mr. PASCO. I was going to ask that we go back to the language used in 1890, to strike out "by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs" and insert "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior;" so that it will read:

One-half of which shall be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in procuring permanent homes for said Indians.

That is the language that was used in the act of 1890.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to state also that a joint resolution was passed by the legislature of Florida relative to the donation of certain lands there for their benefit. The State of Florida has been engaged in this effort to persuade the Indians to accept permanent homes, but I understand that up to the present time it has been without success. I will ask that the joint resolution be also printed with my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered, without objection.
